NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are to be held next Friday and Saturday at Leeds and Bradford, combined on Saturday afternoon with the opening of the new church, of which the Rev. W. Rosling is minister, at West Bowling, Bradford. A letter from the officers of the Association calls attention to these meetings, and full particulars are advertised in another column.

MEMBERS of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will remember that the next meeting is to be held on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 30. We understand that on the evening of that day the Association will hold a reception at Essex Hall for the purpose of bidding farewell to the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., on his return to America.

DR. CROTHERS re-delivered his Essex Hall lecture on "The Making of Religion," in the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, on Wednesday, October 3, the chair being taken by Mr. G. A. King, the chairman of the congregation. Upwards of four hundred persons were present, and men seemed to be in the majority. The audience included some of the most prominent citizens and most thoughtful men of the city of various denominations. The lecture was followed with intense interest, and many of those present have since expressed their admiration of Dr. Crothers' ability as a thinker and his force as a speaker. The experiment of having the Essex Hall lecture re-delivered in provincial towns has, so far as Norwich is concerned, proved a complete success.

ON this lecture the Eastern Daily Press of October 4 made the following comment:—"The note upon which Dr. Crothers concluded his powerful address on 'The Making of Religion' at the Octagon last night is a note which cannot be sounded too clearly or persistently in the modern world. The religious instinct takes many forms in the course of human history, but fundamentally, and underneath all the varying concrete beliefs in which it is embodied from changing age to age, it is the same instinct working to the same end. It is the instinct for the kingdom of God upon earth; for the realisation of a kind of life, in all our human relationships, that can satisfy the human craving for righteousness. It is a false philosophy which, when high ideals are preached, speaks of 'human nature being what it is' as an obstacle to the attainment of those ideals. Why, the very existence of high ideals comes of human nature being what it is; and there is no deeper or more constant hunger in human nature than the hunger and the impulse for righteousness. The religious instinct, in spite of many superficial appearances to the contrary, was never stronger in the world than to-day. If, as appears to be undoubtedly the case, it is becoming weaker in the form of reliance upon mere theological creeds, it is reappearing with a hundredfold force in the form of insistence upon an adjustment of the workaday activities of the world to the requirements of Christian ethics. If the churches are getting into shallows, citizenship is in full tide with the religious impulse; and men are coming to realise that the religious work now crying out to be done is that, as Dr. Crothers puts it, of 'organising for the work of building up upon the earth a just, true, generous, human society, the old ideal of the kingdom of God here upon earth.' Through all our municipal and national work this ethical influence is sweeping to-day, giving us a new conception of the meaning of citizenship, as the instrument by which men can help to work out the Divine purpose in the order of the world. Our political and municipal problems are, in this true sense, becoming religious problems; problems of the coming of the kingdom. The passion of a great purpose is vitalising them."

Two new students from the Far East will be welcomed at the beginning of the session at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday next—Mr. Haldar, of Calcutta, the Brahmo student, and Mr. Nagai, of Tokio, the Japanese student. These two gentlemen arrived in London this week, and were welcomed by the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at Essex Hall, at the meeting of the Committee on Wednesday afternoon. Of Mr. Haldar's farewell at Calcutta, the following account was given in one of the Indian papers:—"Babu Sasadhar Haldar, the Manchester College Scholar-elect left Calcutta for England on August 23. On the morning of the same day, after special divine service conducted by Pundit S. N. Sastri, he was accepted as a Candidate Worker of the Sadhanashram, with which he had been associated for the last three years. In the course of his sermon. Pundit Sastri reminded the pilgrim of the unknown dangers, temptations, and spiritual dryness that he might have to face in the distant land, and said that the only safeguard against them was reliance on the mercy of God, that his connection with the Ashram, the spiritual home, would silently help him in the matter, that the Ashram had no other treasure to give to him except their prayers, which would always be for his safety and progress. Babu Umeschandra Datta advised him to remember the noble mission of his life and the expectations of the Brahmo Samaj." We trust that both of our friends will find in this country abundant sympathy and stimulus for that higher life to the service of which they are devoted. Mr. Sukhtankar, the former Brahmo student at Manchester College, is still pursuing his studies in Germany, with the aid of the Hibbert Trustees. He is to have another session there before returning to India.

THE Exhibition of the collected works of Mr. Holman Hunt at the Leicester Galleries (close by the south side of Leicester-square) should by no means be missed. It is to be open during October and November. The catalogue has a prefatory note by Sir W. B. Richmond, and his portrait of Holman Hunt is also in the Gallery. The duplicated pictures are of special interest, and in more than one instance the smaller and earlier version seems to us the more beautiful of the two. So with the "May Morning on Magdalen Tower," especially in the boys' faces, and in "The Triumph of the Innocents," of which the earlier version, painted in 1870, has not before been exhibited. Here the conception of the mother and the child Jesus appear to be quite different from that of the larger picture. The look on the child's face is more mystical and very lovely. Of the well-known "Finding of the Saviour in the Temple" there is also a small version, lent by Mrs. George Holt. The portrait of the artist himself, painted in 1868, but never before exhibited, is wonderfully vivid. It is to go to the Uffizi Gallery at Florence.

THE seventh Lees and Raper lecture will be delivered by the Rev. Dawson Burns, D.D., in the City Temple, London, on Thursday, October 25. The Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., has consented to preside. The subject of the lecture will be, "The Bible and Temperance Reform." The date of the lecture occurs during the week of the Jubilee Celebration of the National Temperance League. Admission will be free by ticket only, to be had from the Secretary, 20, Tothill-street, Westminster.

THE Rev. F. K. Freeston, in a letter to his congregation, printed on the cover of the Essex Church Calendar for October, and dated from Cambridge, Mass., gives some impressions of church services and methods in New England, and adds:—

"Great principles make great claims. These lines are being jotted down on old Lexington Common, seated on a form in front of the boulder stone on which are the famous words, attributed by Theodore Parker to his grandfather;—'Stand your ground. Don't fire unless fired upon. But if they mean to have a war, let it begin here.' These warlike orders contain for us resolute, yet pacific advice: Stand to your ground—the ground of civil and religious liberty, the ground of spiritual catholicity. Don't fire unless fired upon—that is to say, don't begin, or be drawn into theological controversy, unless attacked unjustly. But if our principles are put in jeopardy, let our defence be prompt and ready, and let their witness be found first in each of our lives."

AT Little Portland-street Chapel, last Sunday evening, the Rev. J. Page Hopps discoursed to a large congregation on "City Temple Theology." Basing his remarks on Mr. Campbell's Christian World summary of his address to London ministers, and on his published expositions of the Atonement and the Person of Jesus, Mr. Page Hopps came to the conclusion that on all the vital points there was not the slightest difference between his own teachings and Mr. Campbell's. In closing, Mr. Page Hopps said:—"We must be permitted a little self-congratulation. The small band of brave and honest people who have held the fort here so long may well be glad to see their testimony borne, in every particular, in another of the high places: It has been so borne again and again in Westminster Abbey, and now in the City Temple. We rejoice, and only regret that the bearing of it is overshadowed by unfaithfulness to solemn legal pledges and trusts—unfaithfulness which sets a bad example even to the Stock Exchange. Still, that testimony is borne, and we are glad, and all the more because all the signs of the times point to the fact that the long-condemned faith of the Unitarian is destined to be the universal faith of Christendom."

THE Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, of Chatham, who went out to take the place of the Rev. R. Balmforth at the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Cape Town, during his temporary absence through ill-health, received a cordial welcome from the congregation at a social meeting held at the church on Sept. 7. Mr. F. J. Centlivres, of the South African News, who presided, offered a hearty welcome to Mr. Davis, and expressed the gratitude of the congregation for his kindness in coming to help them in their need. Mr. L. Woodhead promised they would do everything to make Mr. Davis's sojourn in the Colony a happy and pleasant one. They had a superb climate, and if they could stay the hand of the "Cape Doctor" (the south-east wind) they could promise their visitor nature in her most smiling mood. Mr. W. S. Woodhead and Mr. Agate (brother of the Rev. Dendy Agate) also spoke; and Mr. Davis gratefully acknowledged the warm-hearted reception that had been accorded to him. He was glad to be of service in relieving an esteemed fellow-student, but their gratitude must be given to his congregation at Chatham, who had in a disinterested spirit consented to his absence.

WE hear from the Rev. C. D. Badland, of Kidderminster, that the report (which we gave in the INQUIRER of September 22) of the attendance at the magnificent Van Mission meeting at Todmorden was unintentionally exaggerated. From 1,500 to 2,000 was the estimate of enthusiasm. From 700 to 1,000 is the revised estimate.

READERS who know and value Mr. Jonathan Nield's admirable "Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales" will be interested to hear that he is himself adventuring into the field of fiction. His novel "Slings of Fortune" is published by Mr. H. R. Allenson.

Cornhill has this month as frontispiece an interesting portrait of Charlotte Brontë, from a water-colour drawing by Paul Héger, of Brussels. The original, which is now in the National Portrait Gallery, was painted in 1850.

THIS month's World's Work and Play has a most interesting account of Mr. W. T. Carr's discovery and elaboration of a new form of "Cereal Rubber," which promises to be of the utmost importance in meeting the present enormous demand for rubber, due to motor-cars and other things, for which the natural supply threatens to be insufficient. The article mentions that Dr. Priestley, in his work on perspective, calls attention to india-rubber as a novelty for erasing pencil marks, and states that "it is sold in cubical pieces of half an inch for three shillings each."

THE PORTRAIT OF DR. DRUMMOND.—Any old students of Manchester College, Oxford, who have not yet received a copy of the photogravure of the portrait of Dr. Drummond, and wish to have one, are requested to communicate at once with the Rev. V. D. Davis, 9, Nightingale-square, Balham, S.W.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

VIII.—MINISTRY.

THE controversy which rages round the terms "priest" and "presbyter" would be very differently regarded, if we would agree to make the teaching of Christ, and not the actions of his first followers, the real ground-work and constitution of the Christian ministry. It is easy to see how the varied circumstances and increasing activities of the early churches would lead to the appointment of special officers; how some would in a measure, and almost of necessity, take up and carry on, in some form, the older ministries of the temple and of the synagogue; whilst others, more free from Jewish tradition, would to some extent find their models in Gentile administration. But why should we throw ourselves into the developments of the second century, when the threefold ministry of bishops, presbyters, and deacons had established itself in all, and fight an endless battle over the distinctions between the apostolate and the episcopacy, the episcopacy and the presbyterate, the presbyterate and the diaconate? Can we appeal to the words of Christ himself, if not for plain direction, at least for hint and suggestion?

In his recorded teaching there is mention, so to speak, of three orders of ministry. The first order is that of "servants." "He sent forth his servant at supper time." He was to carry a message to the labouring poor in "streets and lanes," and then to the wandering poor of "highways and hedges." The minister is here the missionary, a servant sent on an errand.

The second order was that of "stewards." "Who then is the faithful and wise steward whom his lord shall set over his household, to give them their portion of food in due season?" The minister is here a servant with authority, entrusted with duties of administration within a definite sphere, but still a servant.

The third order is the order of "pastors." It is foreshadowed in the words, "Feed my sheep"; it is recognised in those writings of the apostolic age (Acts xx. 28; Ephes. iv. 11; 1 Pet. v. 2) which make mention of the "shepherd" and his "flock." The minister is here a leader and ensample, comes into more tender relationship, and has a wider oversight.

There are indeed other aspects of ministerial office. St. Paul speaks of some of these when he says that the minister is a prophet, to edify and comfort and console; a herald, carrying a proclamation from place to place; an ambassador pleading between God and man. Nor is it difficult to understand how at last the idea of priesthood, and then the term priest, would come into particular connection with the Christian minister. The priesthood of all members of the Christian brotherhood was a point insisted on from the beginning (1 Peter ii. 5, 9; Rev. i. 6; v. 10; xx. 6), but by degrees, there can be no doubt, the priesthood of the clergy took on a representative character—the official represented the universal—and so the way was prepared for those exclusive claims which were afterwards made for the clergy alone. At the same time the words used by Christ may be held to say all that is essential to the definition of the Christian minister. Why did he not draw out a complete system of Church government? Because a system of official Church government was not in itself a thing to be desired. The Christian ministry, whatever forms it might take, was to serve a temporary purpose. In the ideal Christian Church there are no official ministers. To this ideal Christ was true, and made no provision for a permanent ministry. It was left to the Church in each age to form its own practical organisation according to its own requirements. The question is not, which is the right form, for all forms may be right, if they bring us nearer to the ideal. Meanwhile, nothing will be gained by denunciation of the priest. The priest goes with a certain sacerdotal theory of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and of the benefits therefrom derived and applied. To the greater part of Christendom the theory is as dear as life itself. When the theory passes away, then the priest will pass away also. Whatever may be thought of the claims of the historic priesthood, the priest in actual life is not to be struck out of the honoured types of devoted service. Let the universal priesthood be realised in fact, and history will re-shape itself; angry contentions will die down, and the mind of the Master will inspire new methods for the better and more peaceful ordering of the household of God. THE Twenty-eighth Annual Report of the Social and Political Education League, just issued, is a record of widely-extending and valuable work. The League was founded in 1877 by the late Sir John Seeley for the gratuitous delivery of lectures on social and political topics from a strictly non-partisan standpoint. The lecturers are drawn, in the main, from the Bar and the Universities, and many men, since famous, commenced their public work under the League's auspices. Amongst these were Lord Milner, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Arnold Forster, the Postmaster-General, and the Solicitor-General, together with many members of the House of Commons. Huxley, Froude, Creighton, Leslie Stephen, and Lecky were Presidents of the League, and the Honorary Secretaries have included Professor Dicey, J. K. Stephen ("J.K.S."), and Mr. St. Loe Strachy, editor of the Spectator. During the past year 293 lectures were delivered, as compared with 276 given last year. Nearly 200 of these were illustrated, and dealt with foreign lands and peoples. Series of lectures have also been given at University Settlements and Public Libraries. The president for the current year is Dr. Nansen, the famous explorer, who is now Norwegian Minister in London. Mr. Holford Knight, 5, Pump-court, Temple, is hon. secretary, and the organising secretary is Mr. A. H. Reed, c/o W. L. Richards, Esq., 23, Old-square, Lincoln's inn, W.C., to whom applications for Lectures and lists of Lecturers should be addressed. The Presidential address, by Professor Maitland, on "The Making of the German Civil Code," delivered last June, was published in the August Independent Review, from which it has been reprinted and issued as a separate threepenny pamphlet by the League;

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

THE blunt granite head of Piz Padella is but lightly powdered, like an eighteenth century bishop's, and Piz Languard towers bare above its snows; but Piz Palü and Piz Morteratsch are white, the awful precipice of Piz Tschierva stands knee deep in drift, and the Corvatsch glacier will never be uncovered again till next July. What a load the Piz della Margna has to bear, that gracious giant that often keeps a halo of blue when all our own summits are hid in haze, and fills us with a sick longing for Italy! The ridge of St. Moritz hides Scesaplana; but I must needs think of poor Domenic Pünchera, the much loved Pfarrer, who was laid to rest there last week, cut off in the fulness of health and power, and sorely, sorely bewept. He had been shooting chamois, and was killed by his own gun. I hate the killing of these innocent and beautiful things. I have always hated it, and now I hate it the more. Whom will they choose to succeed him? There stands the graceful tower of Celerina church against the yellowing pine woods. Over my head our own belfry tells the hour, and I hear, or fancy I hear, a faint echo from Pontresina. All the long, straggling line of our church towers is dear to me, for the sake of Lodge-road, Park-street, Cairo-street, and the Great Meeting—which have only one tiny spire to the four of them—for the whole Engadin belongs to The Way; there is not a creed-bound parish to the sixty miles of it. Contented with the thought I sit on my sunny balcony, with the Swiss flag and the British fraternally flapping, and the Protestantenblatt and INQUIRER on my table.

Here are the Address of the Union for Social Service, the Report to the L. and S. E. Assembly on Public Questions, and a leading article on both—all good reading. I am glad that the N.C. Union Committee have abandoned the demand of their promoters for organised and collective action in the political arena, and are now asking for something reasonable and practical—namely, organised and common study of social facts and needs. At the beginning of the century a number of proposals appeared in the INQUIRER. They raised much dust, because they began with the adjuration, "Let us return unto the Lord," which was generally regarded as an impertinent innuendo. But one by one they are being carried out. We have, for instance, the Hibbert Journal (thanks be to God, and honour to its editor and his backers); we have the courses of lectures on the Bible and the new light; and here we have, full in view, the lectures on social facts and needs. I see reported the remark of a brother that "now again is a time when our ministers ought to speak out." He is referring to the opium traffic, but how often have we heard this phrase applied to social reform! Is it quite fair? Have we ministers a definite thing to say which for reasons unworthy, or for reasons prudential, we persistently withhold? Are we a confederacy of Jonahs? I think we do speak out so far as the sacred limits of our trust warrant us. We do urge congregations to remember and execute their duty to all their brethren—not only those whom they meet and see, but also those with whom the complexity of modern commerce and the tie of civility link them. We have also done an imperfect something towards the performance of another duty. We have displayed some of the poignant facts themselves. We have demonstrated the immense need of earnest, common effort to fulfil the law of love. But what we all need is light, light on the miseries to be remedied, on the remedies which seem most hopeful, on the means to reach and apply them. Wherefore I read with much pleasure the offer of the N.C.U. to promote classes for study, and help them with syllabuses and lists of books. Will they not go a little further and issue in some permanent printed form a general guide to the whole matter—a syllabus of their syllabuses, with a list of those books which are most helpful to us in our first philanthropic gropings? There goes the Chiavenna coach. How I should like to share the box seat on it with the President of the N.C.U., and impress on my helpless prisoner his supreme aptitude for such a task!

And now I want to make another suggestion, connected indeed with this subject, but distinct from it. A prominent aim with all churches is health of character in the community. Health of character—how well we know it!—depends like health of mind on health of body. Are there any of those spiritual prigs left among us who live fugitive and cloistered in other-worldliness and look on a matter like common cleanliness as common and unclean? Surely not. We know that bodily health is virtue, that bodily health (I speak as a fool) is wisdom. O wind of God, blowing here about me, could I but set thee blowing through foggy London, and smoky South Lancashire and the Black Country, and tuberculous Leicester! Ye pine-beleaguered pillars of purity, how shamed I am to be among you, when all those thousands of my countrymen are slowly dying for want of what ye preach and practice and give! Can I not speed your message to some few ears, at least, that hearing will understand, and understanding will feel and do! First, let me say to all who can give a thousand pounds or a penny, that in Davos there is a great German sanatorium, a Swiss sanatorium with many free beds, a Dutch sanatorium, a Franco-Belgian association, but as yet no English Sanatorium. There is an English sanatorium to be built, approved by the Queen, and called by her name, but it still lacks some few thousand pounds. There will be a bazaar in Davos this winter to help to raise them; and there is a hungry treasurer always waiting for gifts in cash. I beg earnestly on behalf of this institution. Those who give to it are giving health and life. I will forward, and so I am sure will the editor of the INQUIRER, and any of our ministers, whatever is sent in cash or kind for the Queen Alexandra Sanatorium.

This is a parenthesis. The mountains interrupted me. What I set out to say is of wider reach. Health is virtue, health is wisdom. Had I but known early enough what I know now, how much better and more useful had my life been! How much better hope of future usefulness should I have! And what is true of me is true in greater measure of millions. Our children, our young men and women, our parents and workers do not know how to live, so as to keep well and promote the health of others. I want a Band of Health attached to every church. I want the method and the duty of health, with all solemn sanctions, inculcated, impressed, exemplified. I want these Bands of Health to enlighten and stimulate first of all their own members in wholesome living—in the right uses of food, air, water, work and play, the right indulgences, temperances and abstinences—but I want them also to ally themselves in every town, to federate in every county, and in a national union, and jointly to promote the will, and enforce the duty, of presenting the body a living sacrifice to God. Tracts, text-books, classes and lecture courses are of course; but these centres of vital force must go further. Let them not rest until they compel those whom they cannot induce. One simple police regulation, adopted already by some towns, would, if adopted by all, save thousands of lives and centuries of distributed suffering every year. Let us follow Christ not only in his lovely life, but also, through the same spirit, in his miracles of healing. Is not the time ripe and the duty clear? I entreat those who feel with me, and especially those who can and will make a practical beginning, to respond at once to my appeal, and I beg the Editor of the INQUIRER to open his columns to their suggestive criticism.

Health, how good it is! Almost the best thing, but not quite. To-day is sacred to the memory of Donald Wilson, an almost life-long invalid, and a hero and saint. Discomfort never left him, and he was familiar with pain. Those things in which most men find their earthly happiness he was bound to renounce. God knows in what gardens of Gethsemane he sometimes secretly agonised. What his friends know is that the man who had every licence to bewail himself and lean on sympathy was a radiating centre of cheerfulness, helping all with whom he had to do—and in what a way! So prompt, with such insight and anticipation, and above all with such grace and courtesy! Nobody who did not know him believes what we tell of him. The epitaph is, as a rule, overloaded, and where it tells the simple truth, who shall distinguish? But those who knew him knew bravery, gentleness, simplicity, highmindedness, adorned with talent, refinement, and culture. If you want to do a mean thing, or think a coarse or selfish thought you must forget Donald Wilson. Heu, quanto magis est tui meminisse, quam cum aliis versari!

The skies are grey now; angry jets of sunlight play on Munt Chalcagn, and thick clouds are gathered over the Silser See. I am awakened from sad reverie by the voices of little children, prattling in their own Esperanto, a mixture of the Latin, Italian, and German which prevail in this polyglot region. They remind me of the little Yiddish chatterers whom I have heard in Hull and East London, and they take my thoughts to Poland and Russia, and the deadly wrongs which their tortured race is enduring. Could not their fellow Unitarians in England express, at least verbally, the deep sympathy they must needs feel with the whole Jewish people? Will the Conference Committee and the B. and F.U.A. Council consider it?

A greeting from the deserted Engadin to all friends, and to our whole household of faith!

Samaden.

E. W. LUMMIS.

PONTYPRIDD CHURCH OPENING.

THE Unitarian congregation at Pontypridd, which, since its formation in 1892, has been obliged to worship in hired halls, entered on Monday, October 1, into the possession of its new church building in Morgan-street. The little church is in a good situation, and is designed in excellent taste. Dr. W. Griffiths was minister at Pontypridd for seven years, and then, after an interval, the Rev. Simon Jones, the present minister, came in 1904. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, formerly of Pontypridd, was the first secretary of the congregation.

At the opening ceremony there was a large gathering, and the Rev. Simon Jones, standing by the entrance to the church, spoke the following words of dedication:—

Dearly Beloved,—He whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain dwelleth not in temples made with hands, but wherever there are souls that seek Him and lie open to His entering spirit there is the house of God, there is the gate of heaven. Yet it is meet and fitting to dedicate a house of man's making to the service of the Highest, in the sacred silence of which the divinest thought, the noblest aspiration, and the deepest, purest affection may be felt and cherished.

Let us dedicate this house to the reverent search for truth. May its doors be ever open to truth-seekers, and to its pulpit may truth-tellers be ever welcome. To the service of righteousness, which createth clean hearts and giveth the beauty of holiness, to the religion of love, the fellowship of hearts, the gospel of universal brotherhood, and to the bearing of one another's burdens we would dedicate this building as our church home.

To the sanctity of home ties, to the memory of the saints, to the defenders of the nation's righteousness, to the prophets of the ages, to the noble Nazarene, to an ever-growing faith, and to the cause of universal religion we would dedicate this house.

Let us dedicate it also to worship. Here may that Presence be sought, and felt who is Infinite Life, Infinite Light, and Infinite Love; and here may that prayer which the Master taught his disciples he lisped with childlike trust—"Our Father who art in heaven."

Here may little children be led into the ways of wisdom and the paths of peace. May the mature be reminded of those things which abide unto life eternal. And hither may the aged turn their steps to find the rest of God.

May babes be brought here to their dedication; may marriage vows be sanctified; and here may the shadows of death be lifted.

May it stand until it be no more, as a memorial and a testimony to the two great commandments of the Master—Love to God and Love to Man. Amen.

Mr. Arthur Ll. Thomas, the architect, then handed a gold key to Mrs. Mary

Jones, the oldest member of the congregation, who performed the opening ceremony, and was the first to enter the church, followed by minister and congregation. The first hymn was Robert Collyer's "Unto Thy temple, Lord, we come."

The Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS preached the sermon of dedication from the texts John iv. 24 and x. 16—"God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship in spirit and in truth." "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold. And there shall become one flock and one shepherd." In the course of his sermon, he said that modern Christianity was stirred with many movements, and those who sympathised with the liberal movement were powerfully persuaded that Christianity is a religion of the spirit, and cannot any longer be presented as a religion of dogmatic theology. Religious sympathy and religious affinity was the attractive, binding power, and not agreement on theological dogma. A free catholic church was impossible, timid critics would say, human nature being what it is. He replied that a creed-bound church was impossible, human nature being what it is. The dogmatic churches had been well tried, and their failure to secure real unity was never more apparent than to-day. Unfolding the great conception of the organic unity of life, the preacher dwelt eloquently on the true basis of Christian fellowship and churchmanship, quoting Morris's well-known lines: "Fellowship is heaven, lack of fellowship is hell. Fellowship is life, lack of fellowship is death, and the deeds that ye do on earth it is for the sake of fellowship—ye do them."

PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the new Town Hall.

Mr. JOHN LEWIS, chairman and treasurer of the congregation, presided, and said there was need for a liberal church in which members could meet and commune with God in their own way. The dogmatic teaching in the orthodox Church was not in keeping with the sentiments of the people of to-day.

Mr. H. W. THOMPSON said he was sure the establishment of their Church and congregation must prove of benefit to the people of Pontypridd.

The Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY said now that the building was an accomplished fact, he trusted that it would be a source of light and leading for liberal thought and free speech and noble life in the town. It was as impossible to stay the advance of liberal thought, knowledge, and reason in religion as to stop the seasons of the year. The Unitarian's aim was to get back to the teaching of the Man of Nazareth; to get down to the bed-rock of common-sense and reason in religion, and because of that they ventured to take their place in Pontypridd. He concluded by wishing prosperity, peace, unity, and blessing upon the new church at Pontypridd.

Mr. L. N. WILLIAMS said it gave him great pleasure to be able to congratulate the congregation upon the fulfilment of their long-deferred hopes. He was very pleased to think that although they had been struggling in the wilderness, as it were, for a long time, their efforts had now met with success. Unitarians were not in antagonism with any of the other Churches; they wished simply to promote true brotherly and sisterly love amongst all people.

The Rev. D. G. REES, of Bridgend, having added his congratulations, Mr. C. H. PERKINS, of Swansea, spoke as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS as one who from the first had taken the keenest interest in the welfare of the church. The Rev. SIMON JONES, having expressed the thanks of the congregation to the friends who had come to rejoice with them, concluded the meeting with hymn and prayer.

AN ORGAN CENTENARY.

WE noted last week the celebration of the centenary of the organ by the congregation of All Souls' Church, Belfast, formerly of the Second Church in Rosemary-street, and the sermon preached on that occasion by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. In the course of his sermon, from the words "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord," Mr. Drummond said:—Of all those invitations to live by admiration there is none more sacred and constant than the great appeal of Christian worship with its promise of "Heaven once a week;

The next world's gladness prepossesst in this."

There are two things which often rob it of its beauty and helpfulness. The first is the restless and unprepared heart, proud enough to criticise, seldom humble enough to pray or thankful enough to sing. The other is a gloomy tone pervading the service which chains the spirit to the sorrows and sins of earth instead of giving it wings into the heaven of love and praise. It may be a good thing to send men home humbled and ashamed, but it is an even higher work of grace to help them to feel the glory of their birthright as sons of God, and to teach them to praise Him not only with their lips but in their lives. Perhaps there is no direction in which we need to strike a clear note of emphasis more than upon this ministry of praise. We should give a large and eager welcome to whatever will help us to discharge it more fitly, and so to restore to men some of the gladness and beauty which they lose too quickly in their traffic with the world. I have a deep reverence for the Quaker ideal of quietness and simplicity in worship. I can understand the scruples which are felt lest worship should become too sensuous, relying too much upon appeals to the eye and ear instead of the plain word to the conscience and the heart. But after all, no rule can be laid down as to what is right or wrong in these matters. It is a question of fitness, of the spirit and aim with which everything is done, not of pleasing human fancy, but of helping men in the best way to praise God. It is possible to preserve a great deal of the Puritan character and spirit, "sober, steadfast, and demure," and still to show generous hospitality to the influence of music and art, with some sense of their sacredness, their ceaseless ministry to human need, and their peculiar fitness to the high offices of religion. It was Milton, the Puritan, the author of the great Puritan epic, who has given us the noblest picture in the English language of the ministry of art to worship.

"But let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloisters pale,
And love the high embow'd roof,
With antick pillars, massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voic'd quire below,
In service high and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heav'n before mine eyes."

To-day we think especially with thankfulness of the place of music in our worship—how it has touched and soothed and inspired us, and brought our hearts nearer to God. It was on September 7, 1806, that our organ was opened in the old Meeting-house of the Second Congregation in Rosemary-street, and tradition, which at least has never been disproved, has it that before it came to us it was in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, and that the great Handel himself had touched its keys. Here in this church it remains to-day our chief outward link with the past, and a most beautiful and cherished symbol of the continuous life of the church and its long tradition of worship and praise. It cannot remind us too often of our debt to the past, for the life of a congregation like this is a precious inheritance, vocal with the praise of many generations, rich with the experience of the men and women who have brought their burdens to be lightened and their sorrows to be comforted and their sins to be forgiven, fragrant with gracious memories of human tenderness and divine consolation. And blending with it all is the voice of our organ as through those hundred years it has rejoiced in the happiness of wedded love, or wailed over the dead, or lifted up the hearts of the people Sunday after Sunday in the praises of God. We like also to look upon our organ as a symbol of something which has been characteristic of the life of this congregation, and of the way in which it has interpreted the meaning and purpose of Christianity. When it was opened one hundred years ago it was the only organ to be found in a Presbyterian meeting-house in the neighbourhood of Belfast, and long afterwards, while the controversy, happily now extinct, raged about the use of organs, it was a most telling practical illustration of the enrichment and elevation which noble music can impart to worship. For we have long held that Christian worship should be in accord with the gracious beauty of the Christian character and with that Christian interpretation of the world which holds that nothing which God has blessed can be common or unclean. And so, without swerving, I hope, from the straight line of rectitude or the plainness of Gospel teaching, we have found a place for music and art, and for many delicate and lovely aspects of human culture and sympathy both in our worship and in our idea of a Christian world. To many people—perhaps to most of us in some moods—music appeals more intimately than the spoken word. It kindles and feeds the emotions of wonder and spiritual desire for which speech seems often too coarse an instrument, and the man who can do this, as he touches the organ keys and makes his own heart speak in the throbbing waves of sound, may be a true minister of God to the people. This, my friends, is what the worship of God should do for us always. It should help to fill our hearts with music and to tune our lives to praise. It should bring all heaven before our eyes—not only the heaven of our hope, where sainted spirits dwell with God, but the heaven that lies about us here in everything which God has made sweet and lovely in its time, the heaven which is within, in the joy and blessing of every faithful heart. And so let us praise Him at all times with organ and voice of melody. Let us praise Him according to His excellent greatness.

AUTUMNAL MEETINGS.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow us to direct the attention of your readers to the advertisement of the Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Leeds and Bradford on Friday and Saturday, October 19 and 20?

Owing to difficulties which arose in respect to place and date, the meetings had to be organised in a hurry, but it will be seen that they promise to be of great interest and practical usefulness. It is hoped that the hearty and hospitable welcome of Yorkshire will be responded to by a large attendance of ministers, delegates, and members of our churches.

THE VAN MISSION.

SIR,—The first tour of the Van should close with a second meeting to-night (October 13) in the famous Stevenson-square, Manchester. The October nights are cold and damp, and it is quite possible that we may have to report a disappointing finish. But it may be supposed that every Unitarian in the country will be satisfied with the large measure of success which has attended the tour as a whole. The Van has been on the road 163 days, and about 140 meetings have been held, with attendances varying from 25 to 1,500. At considerably over half the meetings the number present has exceeded 100; and the aggregate counted adult attendance at stated times far exceeds 20,000. It would be well within the mark to add another 10,000 for those who have been present during some portion of the meetings. The mission has been conducted by ministers who, with one exception, have each remained with the Van for a week. Mr. Bertram Talbot has travelled as permanent missionary, and to his unwearying energy and devotion how great a share of what success we have had is due! Splendid assistance also has been rendered by neighbouring ministers—half a hundred of them. Members of their choirs, congregations, and schools also have supported us, and one of the brightest features of the Mission has been the interest it has aroused in the scattered centres of our household of faith. Most of the Sunday services have been due to local enthusiasm, the original plan making no provision for Sabbath gatherings.

Our provincial associations and many individuals have supplied literature in abundance, and the mission has supplemented this with hymn-sheets, printed notices, and invitations. The expense of the tour will probably approach £120, or something under 15s. per day. This includes all expenses of organisation (which were heavy in the preliminary stages), travelling, haulage, fees, food, printing—everything, in fact, excepting the purchase and equipment of the van.

There are a large number of names in our visitors' book, and during the winter we hope to get into touch with their owners, the Postal Missions having offered their assistance. Then it has already been decided by the Yorkshire Union to continue the good work begun at Shipley, and also at Skipton where our brother, Kelsey White, so soon afterwards to be called away from us, proclaimed the message of the Fatherhood. Half-a-dozen other places also are likely to have winter lectures, and the mission will co-operate in the movements as it is able. We have decided further upon a winter mission for Manchester, and other places are also under consideration.

As soon as possible a lantern lecture will be ready. Churches, schools, and societies are invited to avail themselves of this opportunity of hearing the story of the mission. We shall be able to supply lecturers on payment of travelling expenses, provision of hospitality where necessary, and the taking of a collection in aid of the mission.

Your readers are already aware that the funds for a second van for next season have been provided by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence and Sir John Brunner. This is good news, but, after all, two vans can do but little. If a third and a fourth are provided there will be plenty of work for them, and four vans seem to be the least that we should strive for. What has been achieved this season encourages the hope of a like success elsewhere. No one dreamt of what was in store; but the surprise, the interest, and the sympathy with which the mission has been received argue a great opportunity if we have but the faith to embrace it. The keen interest also of our own people all up and down the land betokens their desire that "something shall be done." One of our correspondents believes that in ten years we could awaken England! At least, let us hope, we could help some of our weaker congregations, re-open some of the old chapels, and convey the message into many places where men have only a choice now between ultra-orthodoxy and seeming infidelity. And that is what we are pledged to. Every man who has lent a hand wants to do so again. Their faith gives us courage; and if we fail it will not be for want of striving.

The Missionary Conference has given long and careful consideration to the whole question of the Mission, and we desire now to build up a fund for the purchase and maintenance of at least four vans. By this means associations in different parts of the country, requiring the use of a van, would be spared the cost of a special purchase; and different districts could be served as occasion allowed. Very considerable economies also could be effected in this manner, and the experience of the first season would be at the disposal of all comers. Suggestions have been made for the acquisition of vans by various associations, and we hope that we may be able closely to co-operate with them. That will be better than frittering away our resources.

I may add that as soon as possible a report of the season's work will be prepared, and a meeting of subscribers and all who are interested will be called in Manchester. Meanwhile, the Conference has appointed a special committee to conduct the work. Mr. Talbot has consented to act as permanent missionary and agent; Rev. J. M. Bass, M.A., 15, Malvern-terrace, Chesham, Bury, has been appointed Treasurer; and I am permitted to continue as Secretary.

Our duty now is to gather up £500, and with that amount we shall hope to secure and maintain four vans during next summer.

THOS. P. SPEDDING, Secretary.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

SIR,—In your issue of the 6th, Mr. Richard Robinson states once again, and very impressively, a part of the problem of poverty which is always with us. Would it were as easy to state the remedy as it is to point out the disease. Being acquainted—as well as some six years' inside experience permits—with the conditions of mining in some of our coalfields, I venture to offer a few remarks on that part of his article which deals with this industry.

The case of the "pit bank" labourer, who, without getting the benefit of the high wages paid to those employed underground, has to be content with short time in the summer, getting down in some districts last summer to two days a week, is indeed a hard one; but it is not made less hard and the remedy is not made plainer, by attributing the short time worked to the supposed deliberate action of the owners in trying to keep up the price of coal. As a matter of fact, nothing is more disastrous than short time from the owner's point of view; a large part of his expenses run on whether the pit works or not, and, as might be expected, the considerable reduction of prices which always takes place in summer does not induce the householder to burn coal when ordinary mortals are suffering from the excess of free heat poured upon them by the summer sun. I say emphatically that, so far as my experience goes, colliery owners and managers are as humane and sympathetic a body of men as any other, and are not guilty of the fiendish conduct which Mr. Robinson attributes to them.

I pass over such trifling misconceptions as that the collier spends "all his time on his back in the mine," and pass to where Mr. Robinson seems to suggest that the difference (or a considerable part) between the 2s. 6d. a ton which he thinks is the labour cost of extraction from the pit and the 20s. or so that the Londoner pays for house coal goes into the pocket of the colliery owner, and concludes that the answer to his problem is not far to seek.

Mr. Robinson is misinformed. There is no colliery in this country, I say without fear of contradiction, where the labour cost is anything approaching so low a figure. It gets down to 4s. in winter-time in some of the thick and easily worked seams, but a more representative average cost in a well-managed colliery, including materials such as timber and machinery, would be 7s. to 8s. per ton; to set against this, the average selling price of all qualities at the pit mouth would hardly be more than 8s. at the present time, and in most cases less.

Shall we not seek a little further for our answer?

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

IN acquiring the new home for the College the Committee hoped that it would lead to an increase of students, and also serve as a hostel for other young men studying at the University. Both hopes are thus early fulfilled. The new session opens with more students than for some years past, and the remainder of the accommodation has proved quite insufficient for the number of young University men who have applied for admission.

This gratifying state of things was announced by Principal Gordon at the opening of the new session last week. The meeting was held in the library, and there was a good attendance.

The chair was taken by Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., who expressed his regret at the enforced absence of the Chairman of Committee, Colonel Jesse Pilcher, to whom the College owed so much. Among those present were the President of the College, the Rev. C. C. Coe; Revs. J. E. Manning (Tutor), E. L. H. Thomas (Secretary), A. W. Fox (Gaskell Examiner), Charles Peach and T. P. Spedding (Secretaries of the Jubilee Fund), and a number of other ministers.

Principal Gordon delivered the opening address of the session, taking as his subject "Peter Bayle, 1647-1706." Of this we are sorry to have no report. The session opens with fourteen students, and among them a Hungarian, Mr. Alexander Kiss. Mr. Walter Short has been elected to the Durning-Smith Scholarship, and Mr. W. T. Davies has passed an excellent examination, entitling him to the Gaskell Scholarship. Donations were announced of an early portrait of Rev. William Gaskell, given by Mrs. E. Bass, of Bury; several sets of periodicals, by Miss Selina Hodges, of Belfast; a valuable set of the Delphin Classics, by the Rev. John Dale, of Selby; and a splendid copy of Macklin's Bible, in six folio volumes, bound in Russia, by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In the Independent Review the article to which we would call special attention is that on "Christianity and the Child" by Miss Florence Hayllar. It is a plea for serious consideration of the nature and capacity of children, and against the common practice of teaching in religion a great deal of what they can by no means understand. "The time for distinctively religious teaching," Miss Hayllar writes, "and for beginning the study of the Gospels and of the Bible generally, is adolescence—taken roughly as extending from the thirteenth or fourteenth to the eighteenth or nineteenth year. A well-nurtured boy or girl is at this time capable of some real comprehension of the life and character of Christ and of the Christian ideal. . . . At this period of life there is a natural and healthful welling up of feeling unknown before, a readiness to follow a trusted leader, a generous ardour of devotion, which, if rightly dealt with, may lift the whole character permanently on to a higher plane. For this power to arise in its full strength it is important that it should not be tampered with during its obscure stirrings in earlier childhood." Ministers of religion, it is urged, ought in their student days to have at least an outline of child-study, with the necessary psychology and physiology pertaining to it. In this number there is also an address by Mr. J. W. Mackail on "The Genius of William Morris." Mr. A. E. Zimmern writes on "Oxford in the New Century," Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P., on "The Land Policy of the Government," and Mr. H. N. Brailsford completes his study of Sir Edward Grey's Foreign Policy, dealing with the Congo and the Pan-Islamic movement.

The Contemporary has an instructive article on "Religious Education before the Reformation," by Mr. G. G. Coulton, which may serve usefully to modify some idealist dreams even of the thirteenth century, and Mr. Ellis Barker, writing of "Education and Mis-Education in Germany" (the latter, the Emperor's own word), gives good reason for holding that all the advantages are by no means on the side of Germany as compared with this country in the matter of Education. "In his speech of the 4th of December, 1890, the Emperor mentioned that, owing to over-study, often three-quarters of the scholars in the upper classes are short-sighted, that in his own class at Cassel eighteen young men out of twenty-one had to wear glasses. No doubt over-study is largely responsible for the prevalence of short-sightedness in Germany, but the evil effects of constant cramming of the mind is aggravated by the utter neglect of the body of the German pupil." The gymnastics they have by no means make up for the lack of games. The great excellence of the technical schools of Germany is shown by the very large proportion of foreigners who attend them, a far larger proportion than at the Universities.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Herbert Paul, M.P., writes on "The Clerical Conspiracy," adducing the evidence given before the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline. "Lord Halifax," he says, "will obey the Bishops if the Bishops will do as he tells them. Is this the sort of Church which the people of England desire to see established and endowed? Are the numerous clergymen for whom Lord Halifax speaks the sort of instructors that Englishmen desire for their children in the national schools?" The article on "Geography in our Public Schools" should be also noted. Miss Florence B. Low contributes a very interesting article on "The Sudermann Cycle." She speaks of Sudermann as the greatest living dramatist, "a writer who by his wide range of subjects, his depth of insight, his emotional sympathy, his power to draw real, living human beings, added to the highest dramatic gifts, should appeal to as large a circle of readers in this country as in Germany, where he ranks with the immortals."

OBITUARY.

THE REV. J. A. NEWELL.

ON the evening of the 5th inst. the death occurred rather suddenly of the Rev. Joseph A. Newell, of Limavady, in his 84th year. Before entering upon the work of the ministry he had been assistant to the Rev. Henry Green in his school at Knutsford. His first ministerial charge was at Bury St. Edmunds, his second at Collumpton, in "beautiful Devonshire" as he loved to call it; then, after a service of about fourteen years in these places, he returned to his native land to become minister of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church in Limavady in the year 1867; his last pastorate reaching into the fortieth year.

A friend writes of Mr. Newell that he loved to dwell upon the harmonies of Nature. His intelligent culture of and love for flowers was notable in the highest degree. He also loved to dwell upon the harmonies of Religion, and entered largely into the heart of what was deepest in the Gospel records, and studied lovingly the writings of those who cherish the things that Jesus lived for. Arnold, Robertson of Brighton, Maurice, Channing, and Stanley were the religious teachers he admired in his early days, and he followed them so closely that they became part of his soul and mind. His Christianity was as wide and forbearing as the very spirit of the Master himself. He loved all that was gentle and joyous in human existence. He was a genial companion, a loyal and affectionate friend, but his genial traits never led him from the path of duty and self respect. It is not remarkable that such a man retained to the end of life his inborn vigour of mind. He loved life, but had no fear of death.

His remains were interred on Monday, the 8th inst., in the family burying ground at Ballee, when a touching eulogy was spoken by his mate in playing fields, school, and college—the Rev. William Napier—also an old Ballee man. The Revs. J. H. Bibby, R. J. Orr, and W. H. Drummond took part in the service.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

COURAGE.

AT the end of his essay on "Courage," Emerson printed the ballad of "George Nidiver," which was written by a lady, who had heard exactly what happened, as she tells it. The poem is very well known, but perhaps some of you will be glad to be reminded of it again: It is one of those simple poems, with a true and beautiful lesson, which it is good to learn by heart:

George Nidiver was a hunter in California, and among the wild mountains he had a little Indian boy as his companion, happy to be with him and to help where he could.

A little Indian boy
Followed him everywhere,
Eager to share the hunter's joy,
The hunter's meal to share:

And when the bird or deer
Fell by the hunter's skill,
The boy was always near
To help with right good will.

One day they were climbing up a narrow mountain gorge, with steep rocks on either side, when two grizzly bears, fierce with hunger, came suddenly down upon them: The man, you will see from what the poem says, had only one charge in his gun.

The boy turned round with screams;
And ran with terror wild;
One of the pair of savage beasts
Pursued the shrieking child.

The hunter raised his gun,
He knew one charge was all;
And through the boy's pursuing foe
He sent his only ball.

The other on George Nidiver
Came on with dreadful pace;
The hunter stood unarmed,
And met him face to face.

I say unarmed he stood,
Against those frightful paws
The rifle butt, or club of wood,
Could stand no more than straws.

George Nidiver stood still
And looked him in the face;
The wild beast stopped amazed,
Then came with slackening pace

Still firm the hunter stood,
Although his heart beat high;
Again the creature stopped,
And gazed with wondering eye:

The hunter met his gaze,
Nor yet an inch gave way;
The bear turned slowly round,
And slowly moved away.

What thoughts were in his mind
It would be hard to spell:
What thoughts were in George Nidiver
I rather guess than tell.

But sure that rifle's aim,
Swift choice of generous part,
Showed in its passing gleam
The depths of a brave heart.

A REJOICING FAITH.

As we go about our business in the world of daily work and of human intercourse, no less than in the special interests and activities of our fellowship in the Church, our constant prayer is for a stronger hold upon the realities of life, and a stronger, more effectual, and rejoicing faith.

The meaning of our faith is that we are with God, and He with us, in all we have to do, in the whole endeavour and aspiration of life; that He is indeed our life, the light of all our seeing, the strength of our endeavour, the moving spirit of our aspiration. We seek to do our daily work mindful of that supreme truth. We come together in the church because we want to be united in the confession that our life is His gift, that all we have is His, in the offering of common prayer and thanksgiving, in the dedication of our life to helpful service, in a common trust, and reverence, and gladness, and the love which must perfect every other gift and grace of life.

But we want that faith to be more assured, to move with more victorious force within our every thought and deed. Where must we look for what we need? In what direction of humble and faithful effort can we hope for the surest deliverance from the corroding influence of doubt, the darkening of vision, the slackening of nerve and energy, which mark a life impoverished or tarnished by any falsehood.

It is not a thing we can compass of our own will and effort, but we can see what God would have us do, by what means He will open to us the clearer vision, where the stress of conflict and of victory must be sought. All the teaching of history is pleading with us, and the testimony of religious souls from the earliest times to our own day. In every generation it has been as it is with us, only in each generation according to the measure of faith and vision that is granted. We have to be doing our own work in the world as it now is, answering to the immediate calls of the spirit in the field of duty, which is here and now. And the teaching of history is ever the same, but with growing clearness as there comes to be deeper insight into human character and capacity, and fuller measure of the spiritual life. The negative teaching of the miseries and failures of the world are not to be neglected, but most helpful and quickening is the appeal of the positive teaching and revelation of a growing religious life. This we have with accumulating force in the ancient prophets, rising to its sublimest height and its most perfect grace in JESUS OF NAZARETH and his great words: "Righteousness first," and "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart and soul and mind and strength, and thy neighbour as thyself." And then in every generation, from that time to this, fresh witnesses testify to that supreme truth that Love is greatest of all, and that in righteousness there is the strength of the Eternal.

Our prayer for higher, more rejoicing faith, must be in the line of that great endeavour, not in words, nor yet in emotion alone, but in the simple steadfast living of our life and the doing of daily duty in that true spirit. Such a living of the life is the prayer, and ultimately the only prayer that can avail; and it is so because our life is with God, and He is here and now ready to help those who humbly seek to do His will, and be led in His true way.

Thus in our daily ponderings of the meaning of life and in our secret prayer, no less than in the fellowship of our communion in the church, we have to keep a firm hold upon that teaching of history, in living touch with those great teachers and witnesses to the divinest truth of our humanity, common to all alike, but in them lifted up nearest to God; yet at the same time never to rest in any memories of the past, even the loftiest and holiest, as though by veneration and reliance upon them our faith might be made complete, but rather to take their testimony as the measure of that to which we must ourselves attain, and let it be a spur to our endeavour and a challenge to the faith which we must ourselves possess, and dare to live out to the uttermost.

The secret of our deliverance into a fuller life of faith and a better future we must find simply in the doing of our own work as it is in the light of present duty, tested by the challenge of those greatest teachers of the past, and the secret pleading of the Divine compassion, justice, truth, and love. And we find at once that there is already a new rejoicing come into our faith, when we realise that we have just to be doing the simple things of daily duty, only with a more earnest spirit and faithful surrender. Our religion must be in doing, and in doing the things that most need to be done to-day. Social service, to uplift and enrich our common life, to make our country the happy, peaceful dwelling-place of a people undegraded and bent on noble ends, to secure for the children and their elders alike opportunities for growth in knowledge and in character, and happy human fellowship at home and in the wider intercourse of life, that is what God bids us be doing now; and to do it as His work. He is moving in these aspirations after a truer brotherhood and the social regeneration of our people; so it is that men shall know how His kingdom is to come; and in the helping of such work, kindled by the spirit that breathes in their common prayer and the worship of the Church, they shall find a new gladness of triumphant faith, and have clear vision of the way by which God is leading them to yet more perfect service in the doing of His will and the communion of perfect love.

DR. CROTHERS TO GUILD MEMBERS.

At the annual Service of the London Guilds' Union, held at Essex Church on Wednesday evening, Dr. Crothers gave a most interesting and helpful address. There was a good gathering of Guild members, and Dr. Crothers congratulated them on the work to which they had set their hands. They must realise that the future of the churches was with the young people. There was nothing more pitiful than a church that was simply living on its past. Critics of the Unitarian Churches did not now so much criticise their doctrine as their attitude, the way in which they so often gave a grand prospectus of their principles and then thought they had done. It was no matter how broad their statement, if it was not to be filled in by the enthusiastic service of those who believed in it and would give something for it. Mere preaching and theorising did not make a free church, but a body of devoted people, who felt "Here is something to be done. We are willing to give our hearts and lives to do it"—people with ideas and ideals. What they asked of the young people growing up in the churches was that they should realise their responsibility. The Guild members ought not to think of themselves as belonging to some separate little organisation, but as part, and a very important part, of the church to which they belonged. They were the advanced guard, and should not be afraid of asserting themselves and telling what they wanted. The elder members, if they saw they were really willing to work, would be glad that they should go forward.

If it was asked, What work the Guilds might do, he replied, Every kind of work needed in the congregation. But in what he had to say further, he would confine himself to one thing, which was educational in its character.

The first great need of their churches was a more and more spiritually and morally intelligent membership—spiritually intelligent. They had many persons intelligent in almost every way, except in things which concerned the religious life. In business and general culture they showed high intelligence, but often were extremely primitive when it came to things concerning the highest spiritual endeavours and ideals of humanity. The Guilds might do a great deal by enlarging and deepening their own thought, and thus help to supply one of the greatest needs of their Unitarian Church—an intelligent comprehension of what is meant by historical religion. They were sometimes impressed by the fact that the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church had a great history; but the teaching of the real history of religion would show them that their own movement was in the line of a long historical evolution. It was the opportunity of the Guilds to make that idea of a continuous development and growth in religion real, so that they might feel it was not a matter of mere words, but of the great facts of life. They belonged to the Church invisible, the Holy Catholic Church, in a different sense from the Roman, a church which included all good men since the world began.

A group of young people in a single winter might have a course of study that would make those things real to them. They could see it in the Bible, rightly studied; and they should take the great crises in the Christian Church, and study them in the persons of the great men, in the lives of such men as Luther, Latimer, Bunyan, Wesley, and Unitarians like Martineau and Parker. It had been his own privilege in a former ministry to succeed Mr. Gannett (at St. Louis), and he was deeply impressed by the way in which he had educated his people in religion, to make them see that it meant not thought alone, but life. He urged the members in their Guilds to follow that example, and encouraged them to realise and rejoice in the greatness of the work to which they were called.

MORNING ASPIRATION.

In the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.—PSALM v. 3.

Look up! Look up in the morning!
Through the mists and vapours peer.
The Father of lights is adorning
His little earthly sphere.

Look up, and his smile will greet thee,
E'en though the sun be dim;
Yea, the Father of lights will meet thee,
Direct thy prayer to Him.

Look up! Look up in the morning!
And away with faithless fear;
His love is thy soul's glad dawning,
And He is with thee here.

HUMAN progress entirely depends upon the fact that there is a governing power of righteousness mightier than all tendencies to evil within human hearts.—H. W. Crosskey.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE eighteenth annual meeting was held at Lewes, on Thursday, October 4. There was service in the Westgate Chapel in the morning, conducted by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Manchester College, Oxford, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Reading.

The collection for the funds of the Assembly amounted to £14 6s.

Luncheon followed in the Corn Exchange, when ministers and delegates were most hospitably entertained, as afterwards also at tea, by the Lewes friends, and there was a large gathering. Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., President of the Assembly, presided, and the guests included the Mayor of Lewes (Mr. Alderman J. Miles), Revs. B. Wilkinson (Congregationalist), D. Wilson (Presbyterian), J. P. Morris (Baptist), and J. Kirtlan (Wesleyan). The Mayor, who is a Churchman, introduced by the President, offered a cordial welcome to the Assembly, and Mr. Wilkinson expressed the pleasure which he and his brother ministers of other denominations had in being present. Of the reasons which led him to accept that invitation, the first was their high regard for Alderman Every, the second was sincere esteem for the Rev. J. Felstead, and the third was the debt they owed to many brilliant preachers and writers of the Unitarian community. Lastly, they were there because of the truths and the principles which the Unitarian churches had stood for in many a stormy day in the history of religious opinion and service in that country. Their churches had not always stood for as much as they could have wished them to have stood for, but they had stood for the Fatherhood of God, for the brotherhood of man, for the freedom of the individual conscience, for spiritual service, for civic righteousness, and for the purification of the State by the application of the principles of the Sermon on the Mount; and because their churches had stood for those things his brother ministers and himself were glad to associate themselves with the Assembly that day. He trusted as years rolled by they would not be afraid and not be ashamed to work together as harmoniously and unitedly as they could socially, educationally, morally, and religiously.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held after lunch in the Westgate Chapel, the President in the chair. The roll was called by the Rev. F. Allen, the secretary. There were 86 ministers, delegates, lay preachers, and other members present.

A letter of greeting and regret for absence was read from the ex-President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, who is in America.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, the treasurer, said he did not regret the adverse balance of £151 6s., because he knew the money had been well and judiciously spent, and he found that friends were always willing to come forward and lighten the balance as much as possible. Last year the adverse balance in the accounts of over £200 had been reduced before the annual meeting to £91; and this year, owing to a donation of £25 from the President, the balance actually stood at £126 6s., and he trusted that good example would be followed by others, so that the whole might be wiped out before the end of the year. He regretted that while the subscriptions and donations were a little more than last year, the congregational collections were £5 1s. 5d. less. So long as he was treasurer he was determined that the good work at Bermondsey and Walthamstow should be sustained. Referring to the auxiliary fund, he pointed out that ten ministers in the Province with incomes of less than £200 a year received its additional aid towards their insurance premiums. He concluded with a reference to the loss of valued subscribers they had sustained through the death of Mrs. Buckton, Miss Teschemacher, and his own brother.

The annual report of the Committee, which, with the reports of the Minister of the Assembly, the S.S. Union, and the Public Questions Committee, had been previously printed and circulated, recorded various operations of the year, including the opening of the new church at Acton, the new efforts at Seven Kings and Wimbledon, and the following settlements in the province: Rev. C. Roper at Kilburn, Rev. A. Farquharson at Maidstone, Rev. C. A. Ginever at Dover, Rev. F. Hankinson at Kentish Town, Mr. Delta Evans at Southend, and Mr. Jesse Hipperston (of Norwich) at Bermondsey, in succession to the Rev. Eustace Thompson, removed to the Domestic Mission at Belfast.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

THE PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, gave the following address:—

Sixteen years have passed since this Assembly last held its annual meeting in this ancient home of Nonconformity, and it then met under the presidency of the venerable Dr. Sadler, who was loved and honoured by all who knew him.

It is my pleasant duty to welcome the delegates of the congregations upon our roll to our meeting in this church, whose history dates back to the period of the ejected ministers, by one of whom, the Rev. E. Newton, it was founded in the year 1687. Our thanks are due to the present congregation, and especially to Mr. J. H. Every, for the very hospitable invitation we have received, and for the kindness and cordiality with which we have been welcomed to-day.

As the report of your committee reminds us, the Provincial Assembly was brought into existence in order to promote fellowship and mutual service amongst the Non-Subscribing Churches of London and the South-Eastern Counties. For two years you have done me the honour of electing me your president, and now that I am relinquishing that pleasant duty I take the opportunity of offering a few remarks upon our constitution and upon the difficulties we meet with.

Firstly, then, by our constitution we are an assembly of congregations, not of individuals. The Assembly consists of ministers and delegates from the fifty-four congregations upon its roll, together with a few ex-officio members. It is these ministers, delegates, and ex-officio members only who can vote at our meetings. Private subscribers of large or small amounts have no locus standi at our annual meetings, and in this respect we differ from the British and Foreign Association and the London District Society, both of which consist of individual subscribers, and do not represent congregations.

Now, how far does the Assembly carry out the objects which I have mentioned? We have a most excellent minister, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who is indefatigable in his visits to the smaller scattered congregations, and who, in addition to his Sunday ministrations, is always ready to give valuable counsel and assistance. When an opportunity presents itself of forming a new congregation in those populous districts which are springing up so rapidly round London, especially to the east and north-east, Mr. Edwards is there to assist in its organisation as soon as your committee sees a prospect of useful work.

This part of our work is very similar to that of the British and Foreign Association and the London District Society, and both of these associations very properly make a grant towards the minister's stipend. But these new congregations need much assistance and fostering before they can stand by themselves. We have also many appeals for help from those older churches, many of them dating from the old Puritan days which are scattered over the country districts. We should like to do much more to promote fellowship amongst our congregations in or near London. To enable us to carry out all this work we have to look to the means provided by the congregations on the roll. This, I am sorry to say, is altogether inadequate, and instead of increasing has considerably diminished of late years. Apart from any grants given to needy congregations, our working expenses come to £180 a year, and the collections from the 54 churches on the roll come to only £106, and for the last three years there has been a heavy debit balance against our treasurer. The falling-off in the collections makes me think that the congregations are less interested in our work than formerly; people are inclined to say that we are merely doing that for which the two other associations were formed.

Now, I have been inquiring how these matters are managed by the other large Provincial Assembly—that of Lancashire and Cheshire, which is a very much older institution than ours, and appears to be vigorous and useful. I find that the work done by that Assembly is purely consultative. A fixed contribution is raised from the churches on its roll, and the money is spent in promoting fellowship amongst the congregations. No grants are made and no new congregations are started. It is considered, I am told, that that work may with advantage be left to the associations which exist for that purpose.

It appears to me that owing to our having exhausted our funds in making these grants, we have failed in that which was one of the primary objects for which the Assembly was formed by the bringing together in fellowship the congregations on its roll, and that by neglecting that duty we have to a large extent lost touch with the well-to-do congregations in London, with the result that they have ceased to take an interest in the Assembly, and the collections have fallen off.

My advice to the Assembly is to pay more attention to the promotion of fellowship amongst the congregations in and near London by affording opportunities of meeting, and thus interesting them in the Assembly and making them feel part of it.

Whilst our minister by his visits acts as a bond of union between the scattered congregations in the country, all that we have lately done for the London congregations is to ask them for an annual collection, and they naturally reply that they know little or nothing of us except that we appear to be doing the same work as the other associations.

It appears to me that our constitution on a congregational basis is not quite suitable for this work of founding new churches. I think that a separate fund should be raised for this purpose from private subscribers, and that our bye-laws should be altered so as to allow these subscribers to vote when the accounts of the expenditure of this fund are under discussion.

I have felt strongly during the last two years that the present position is an unsatisfactory one, and I put forward these proposals so that they may be considered and discussed by the delegates.

The Rev. HENRY GOW, who seconded, expressed strong sympathy with the desire to bring the congregations into closer touch with the Assembly, so that they might feel united in one Union, in a large and unsectarian sense. The President's suggestions would be in the hands of the new committee for consideration.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE pointed out that the missionary side of its work had been forced upon the Assembly because while London had its own missionary society, the rest of the province had no such organisation. It would be injurious at present to drop that side of the Assembly's work.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER emphasised the value of the representative character of the Assembly to the churches, and told of the great helpfulness in the Manchester District of the monthly visits to churches organised by the governing body.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, who had experience of three districts, said that the details of method which suited one might not do for the others. In that Assembly they must look to the annual gathering as the best means of giving them the sense of unity.

On the motion of the Rev. J. HARWOOD, the new committee was instructed to consider the whole matter.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, minister of the Assembly, then presented his report. For the last thirteen years, he said, he had been their minister, and had tried his utmost to bring the churches as close together as possible. He could not speak too highly of the patient faith and courage put into the work of the churches. He thought the time had come to consider the grouping of the smaller churches under one pastor. In his own work he had an extended circuit, and was loyally helped by the lay-preachers, but he wanted more preachers, and the churches must provide them.

The reports having been adopted, the Rev. F. H. Jones was elected President, and the other officers were re-elected. The several committees were elected.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON presented the report of the Public Questions Committee, and moved the resolutions with which it concluded. The Rev. B. K. GRAY seconded.

This report we printed in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 29, and asked for some further information, but none was forthcoming at the meeting. The resolutions which were adopted by considerable majorities, after a somewhat desultory discussion, were as follows:—

(1) "That a duty is laid on the churches to study the problems of social distress, and to give guidance to the nation on the principles of social reform; and, accordingly, that the congregations connected with this assembly be cordially invited to take the subject into their serious consideration."

(2) "That the Public Questions Committee, in conjunction with the General Committee, be instructed to take all necessary steps for urging on the congregation the consideration of the subjects referred to in this report."

The Rev. L. P. JACKS was elected preacher for 1907, and the Rev. W. J. Jupp supporter. An invitation to hold the next assembly at Hampstead was unanimously accepted.

The meeting concluded with a resolution of welcome to the representatives of kindred societies, to which the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and Miss Tagart responded, and a very cordial vote of thanks to the President.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, and was well attended.

Mr. Alderman J. H. EVERY, ex-Mayor, who presided, expressed once more on behalf of the Lewes congregation, their warm welcome to the members of the Assembly, and thanked them for the encouragement and inspiration of their presence.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE spoke on "The Mission and Message of Unitarians." There was a good deal of talk, he said, about "our Free Churches"; but he got tired of that, for he was brought up in the Free Church of Scotland, and left it because there was no freedom there. What the world required was churches pledged to something true, noble, worthy and inspiring. They wanted pledged churches—pledged to truth, liberty, progress, humanity. There were large numbers still terribly burdened in mind, conscience, and life by superstition in religion, by dogmas and beliefs harmful to their minds and lives, and it was a great help to them to lift off that burden. It was a great relief to such people to find that there were others who held those things not to be true, but a travesty of religion. To such people they had a message and must give their help. Many others had cast off the churches and religion altogether, but were wondering whether it was possible to be religious and yet keep an open mind, a clear conscience and a healthy life. To them also they had a message; and further, to the toilers, sufferers, sinners, outcasts of the world. If they had no message to that great army of their brothers and sisters beyond the borders of the churches, then indeed they were cumberers of the ground, unworthy to call themselves disciples of the Man of Nazareth. Unless religion inspired them with the desire to get into touch with the world as it is, with men as they are; unless it helped them to that clearness of wisdom and closeness of touch with men, then their movement had not the future before it that it ought to have. "I am persuaded," he said, "if we could lift ourselves out of our poor, peddling ways, out of our own despairs and despondencies, and empty discussions about names; preaching whatever is true to our own thought, lives, and souls, and touch men with that message, then we should do something for the uplifting of the world and the progress of mankind. No other community is so free to go forward in such directions as the Unitarian."

Let us take heart, shake off our despondency and littleness, and look out once more with fresh eyes upon the world of men, and give them the best we have, the truest thought that has come to ourselves, the noblest aspiration that has touched our own lives; get rid of conventionality and keep close to the truth as we feel it. Whatever is real to ourselves, let us proclaim that, and I believe there are large numbers of men and women, young and old, who will be helped, inspired, and lifted up to higher and nobler conceptions of God and their fellows, of life, duty and immortality. Have done with hesitation, doubt, and empty generalities, and see if we shall not find men and women better for what we have given them, and we ourselves consecrated afresh to God and goodness."

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS spoke on "Creeds and Churches," and as witness to the movement of the churches pointed to the difference between two editions of the Encyclopædia Britannica at an interval of forty years, and to such an address as that by the Rev. R. J. Campbell on "Changed conditions of religious thought." He did not believe in a creedless church, but it must be in harmony with the thought of the age.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER's subject was "Ought we to Proselytise?" but Mr. Bowie, he said, had covered that ground. He gave instances of theological prejudice and want of charity, and showed how constantly earnest young people came to their churches, because only there could they find the freedom they required. It was their business to give people information, to compel them to think, to maintain the supremacy of conscience, and to provide a religious home for the friendless and fugitives from the land of bondage.

Mr. LAWSON DODD spoke on the "Social Aspect of the Unitarian Mission." Emancipation of thought, he said, must be concurrent with emancipation from the thralldom of material things, which robbed men of the best part of life. Their duty as religious people was to take part in that other emancipation with as great earnestness as in the theological battle. There were horrors in the actual struggle of life, in which so large a proportion of the people were engrossed, as great as those of the old theological bondage. That struggle brought men nearer to Christ. They saw the Christian spirit crucified by the world spirit, as Christ was crucified by the Pharisees of old. As religious pioneers had got rid of the terrible doctrine of eternal fire, they had now in the same spirit to face the evils of actual life which were preventible. Jesus cast out demons, and promised his disciples that they should do greater things. They had now to cast out the demons of drink and lust, and make a nobler environment for the people, in which the evils of disease would be no longer possible. They had to feed the multitudes, and they had to house the people. When they had learned the great Christian doctrine of communism they would see the way to this.

A hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. C. A. Ginever, brought the meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

OPENING OF THE WILLERT-STREET EXTENDED PREMISES.

THE great work carried on by the Rev. J. W. Bishop and his helpers at Willert-street has long been cramped and hampered for want of more room. With nearly six hundred scholars in the Sunday-school, with varied activities filling every week evening, and a congregation which overcrowded the little chapel, it was absolutely essential that extensions should be made. To meet the needs arising from this happy state of affairs the committee have carried out a most useful enlargement on plans suggested by Mr. G. H. Leigh. As a result the seating accommodation of the chapel is raised from one hundred to two hundred, and it is now approached by a handsome and easy staircase instead of the semi-ladder which made it almost inaccessible to old folk before. In addition, new rooms are provided which will make five good class rooms on the Sunday, and provide rooms for reading, recreative, and guild work on week evenings. The whole of the work has been well carried out, and while kept plain and simple it impresses one as solid and good. The cost has been about £1,500, and it is being met out of the special fund for which the mission committee appealed, and on which there is still a deficit of about £600.

The opening took place on Saturday last. There was a service in the afternoon followed by tea and public meeting. At the service the Rev. J. C. STREET spoke with much power and appropriateness on the meaning of the influence of Jesus. The secret was in the charm and influence of his personality. That influence had been felt all down the subsequent ages, inspiring and directing the forces of civilisation, ever pointing to a higher ideal of life. No truer home of his great spirit could be found than in these unsectarian missions, whose only purpose was—like his—the doing of good.

There was an excellent gathering in the evening—the gaps caused by departure of many visitors being filled by the actual worshippers and workers at the mission. The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, president of the society, presided, and after the meeting had been opened by hymn and prayer, he drew on his large stores of memory for the encouragement of present-day workers.

The newspapers, he said, were complaining of the lack of sanitary arrangements and bad housing. He could remember the time when Manchester was stricken with panic—when cholera was raging amongst the citizens. At that time Domestic Missions had not been started. In the early thirties he could remember visiting friends in Smedley Lane, Cheetham Hill, and looking down with a very sober thought at the old cholera cemetery. Who thought of cholera nowadays? When he was a domestic missionary late in the fifties he used to see, almost every day, patients suffering with typhus fever. Who heard of typhus fever now? It was an ordinary thing to have that awful fever raging in Liverpool. One of his predecessors in the Domestic Mission there was working with a Catholic priest at the bedside a fever patient, and both died as the result of contracting the disease. They died for something better than mere adherence to a creed; they died martyrs in true religious love and work. Mr. Steintal went on to refer to the time when reading and writing had to be taught in the Sunday-school, and when a large number of the poorer citizens of Manchester were living in cellars. Many improvements had been made since those days, and they could go on with their work and take courage. Domestic missions were doing a great work in Manchester, and he was glad to know that great success had attended Mr. Bishop's efforts at that place.

The Revs. C. Peach, C. W. Cliffe (Congregationalist), and W. Workman (Congregationalist) all bore hearty testimony to the fine work being done by Mr. Bishop and the mission. Mr. CLIFFE said if they differed in creed they were one in spirit, and he was glad to exemplify by his presence the true Christian unity which should be among all those who were the servants of the same loving Father.

Mr. SYDNEY JONES, in an interesting and inspiring address, spoke of the pleasure it gave him to bring the greetings of Liverpool men and women to their fellow-workers in Manchester. These new buildings would stand out as lighthouses sending a guiding light over the shoals and rocks around. Would that this simple beauty might attract many to them to find help and security. Mission buildings and churches should always be beautiful. Dirt was no assistance to goodness. Beauty and light were real helps to the good life. He rejoiced to see the large number of young men present. He urged them to be loyal to the mission and its great work, and to find in it their own great work in life.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH said the need for these new buildings was the measure of their past success. Once they only thought the missionaries should be home visitors, but when the people were prepared, as now, to come out to worship and to meet in social intercourse buildings must be provided. Many people did not realise the state of the homes from which many of the worshippers at the the mission came. Small and lacking nearly all resource and convenience for healthy and decent life they made it all the more necessary that the mission as their common home should be planned on generous and beautiful lines. Mr. Leigh concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to the chairman, to the preacher of the afternoon, and to the Rev. J. W. Bishop for all his work at the mission. He had had the privilege of working with Mr. Bishop during the whole of his ten years at the mission. He had always found him a true pastor and leader of his people, and one who never tired in his effort to carry out the noblest ideals of mission work.

The Rev. W. E. GEORGE seconded, and the resolution was carried with great applause.

The Rev. J. W. BISHOP, in reply, said their thanks were increased in value by being voiced by Mr. G. H. Leigh, himself one of the most constant and faithful of their friends, the actual designer of the present extensions, and their regular counsellor and helper. He himself thought his past grumbling had been justified by the result, and he now rejoiced in the consummation of his hopes. In the past the chapel had often been overcrowded, and he hoped it would be so again in spite of the enlargement. Speaking directly to his own people he said, "We are now provided with better tools, I hope we shall use them to do finer work. I hope you will not think these buildings are too fine. They are for use not for admiration merely, and we are going to use them, I hope, for many years together to the glory of God and to help each other in the good life." In closing Mr. Bishop said the friends who had helped were too numerous for him to name, but he thanked them all. The latest gift had come that afternoon in the shape of the beautiful lectern cloth which Mr. Harrison, of Upper Brook-street, had brought with him. The meeting then closed with hymn and prayer.

A special re-opening service was held on Sunday, when Mr. Bishop was the preacher, and the chapel was so full that additional seats had to be brought in.

"To raise £500 towards the Preston Memorial and Reserve Fund." Such is the object of the bazaar to be held in the Myddleton Hall, Upper-street, Islington, by the congregation of Unity Church, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday next. The book of the bazaar (6d.) opens with an admirable historical sketch, and a list of the ministers of the successive Blackfriars and Carter Lane Chapels, and the present Unity Church, beginning with the Rev. M. Sylvester, one of the Ejected of 1662, and coming down to the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, the present minister, of whom and the late Mr. J. T. Preston, of whom the new school buildings are to be a memorial, capital portraits are given. There are also pictures of the church and the new school front, with ground plan of the latter, which show how great the improvement will be, and of what great service in promoting the vigorous life of the congregation. Myddleton Hall is close by Unity Church.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

"THE harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved!" Not as a jeremiad, but in a literal sense this cry of the old prophet may be taken as true of our churches to-day. The glorious summer has for weeks depleted our pews; holidays have carried off whole families, leaving bare spaces; and even yet, though autumn is in full swing, the holiday spirit lingers on and many faces are yet missing.

The fact that the harvest is past is proclaimed by the many Thanksgiving services which, with their pleasant break into the conventional monotony of our Sunday worship, not only appeal for gratitude to the Great Provider, but remind us of that spiritual harvest for which we sow, and part of which we hope to reap all the year round.

But we are not saved, if being saved means being in a state of perfect health. Which of the many churches of the land is fulfilling all the purposes of its existence, doing all the good it aims at, helping all the souls whom it might touch? "We have not already attained neither are we already perfect, but we press on." Be this our motto for the coming winter work.

You hint, Mr. Editor, that I need not give too many details of all that is planned or actually doing. I might fill columns otherwise, as every congregational calendar I have seen abounds in such items. The days are past for Sunday services and possibly a small Sunday-school as the be-all and end-all of a church's existence. Week by week meetings of various kinds—literary, temperance, social, educational—strive to draw in young and old, and to turn to useful ends the motive power generated in the hours of worship.

Speaking briefly, I believe there never was a time in which more sanctified energy and ingenuity was displayed with this object, with a resulting sense of life and brotherhood through our ranks. This is distinctly true of the Liverpool district. Looking back over forty-five years I can trace a steady growth of the sense of solidarity; of cordial sympathy between the various congregations and the various grades of social rank in those congregations. We are more democratic and more hearty than in the older days.

The summer which thinned congregations saw that inspiring movement, the Van Mission. It is hard to over estimate the value and meaning of this new departure. Never before in the history of our intensely proper and starchily conventional denomination has so boldly unconventional an attempt been made to show that we have a gospel to preach. A minister or a layman here and there may have tried open-air preaching; theatre services have been spasmodically tried and given up; but a combined move, calling into play a considerable number of ministers, lasting over several months, and pursuing a steady and well elaborated plan, indicates a new sense of opportunity and responsibility. An open door has been put before us, one which we should never allow to be shut by any neglect of ours. One great gain has been the arousing of a fresh enthusiasm in churches within reach of the chosen sites where the van was in full swing. Ministers, singers, and people have in many cases turned up night after night, deriving fully as much benefit by the breezy addresses and questions and answers as those especially aimed at.

Vans are needed all over the land, and probably they will be forthcoming; and in proportion as we give we shall also receive.

Years ago, on my return from Japan, in a paper read before the B. and F. U. Association, I expressed a wish that some wealthy man or men would meet the cost of an extra sheet in THE INQUIRER, to be devoted to church and missionary items. The Van Mission fully reported in such a sheet would do more, I believe, to stir up our zeal and deepen our faith than can well be measured. Next summer, with two vans at work, such an enlargement would be invaluable.

Coming to our immediate district, we are looking forward to the 18th inst., when Dr. Crothers will lecture in Hope-street Church. We trust that it may be crowded out with members of our various congregations and general public. These occasions draw us together and do us good, just as Dr. Carpenter's lectures in the early months of the year did. This one will also deepen our interest in our Unitarian brethren in the United States.

A sign of the times is an invitation to the minister of Hope-street Church, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, from the Young Men's Christian Association, to take part in a set debate on the Seat of Authority in Religion; whether it lies in the Church, the Bible, or the Man! A Roman Catholic priest, an orthodox Nonconformist minister, and Mr. Roberts will respectively defend these positions. For an avowed Unitarian to be invited by such an evangelical Association is a portent. At St. Helen's, again, our district missionary, Rev. R. P. Farley, has been invited to an important commemoration in connection with a leading orthodox chapel; a fine testimony to growing width, and also to the position Mr. Farley is winning in that town.

Coming to the work of our District Association, it is cheering to be able to report such a generous response to an appeal for additional funds, that after clearing off an adverse balance of nearly £200, it has been possible to engage an assistant missionary for a trial six months, to take charge of the Garston Mission, which has hitherto been without any settled pastor. Choice has fallen on an ex-candidate for the Primitive Methodist ministry, who, after doing useful work as paid lay preacher in that body, outgrew its theology, and has been amongst us for some time. He did good service at the Bond-street Mission in an interim, and we look hopefully to his being successful at Garston. A reception meeting will be held on the 24th inst.

Of our youngest effort, that at West Kirby, nothing great can be said. It is still in the day of small things, but the steady attendance and liberal financial support give great encouragement, and we trust that in a while a fair number of the unchurched inhabitants of that neighbourhood may be drawn in. I hear that many of the young generation, promising young men especially, have been driven into revolt by the hard orthodoxy current in the local churches. If not hardened too far some of them may find a broader view of religion still possible to them. Even if all who are already distinctly Unitarian in belief would join us we should show a respectable number; but, alas! the old parable of the supper to which many were bidden, and the same excuses, practically rule many to-day.

Our three Domestic Missions are now in full swing for the winter's work. That in Mill-street, with its magnificent buildings, started on the 1st a week's special temperance effort. In pouring rain the people flocked in till the large hall was filled. An ex-Lord Mayor (Mr. John Lea) presided; a gifted Australian lady sang; and rousing popular hymns gave all a chance of joining in.

The Hamilton-road Mission has also attractive, though smaller, premises; and is always full of life and useful activity. It is doing a fine work in a neighbourhood which has been flooded by workers of small means, but of intelligence and energy. The many teachers and helpers at this mission are drawn entirely from its own ranks.

The Bond-street Mission premises, which are far from ideal, have been thoroughly cleaned and painted during the summer, and all is ready for a campaign of usefulness. The mothers' meeting is very popular, and is conducted by ladies from our leading churches.

Taken all in all, Liverpool and district are in sound health, full of hope and energy; for which let us all be thankful.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The congregation assembled on Wednesday evening, October 3, when Dr. John Hunter conducted the service, completely filled the church. The eminent preacher was in excellent voice, and his prayers and readings were deeply impressive. His sermon, on "a practical, thorough-going, and consistent faith in God," was a fervent plea for religious faith. As a reasoned argument it was perfect, and his delivery was at the highest pitch of eloquence. The hearers were enthralled throughout, and felt that to be so uplifted and inspired was the rare experience of a lifetime. Dr. Bimal C. Ghosh spoke on Sunday, October 7, to large congregations. His expositions of the meaning of religion and the harmony of religion were illuminative and edifying. These continuous opening services have been helpful beyond all expectation.

Accrington (Induction and Welcome).—The induction and welcome meeting of the Rev. J. Islan Jones, B.A., minister of the Oxford-street Church, took place on Saturday, Oct. 6. In the afternoon at 3 o'clock a service was held in the church, when the devotional part was conducted by the Rev. R. Travers Herford; the charge to the minister was given by Dr. Drummond (late Principal of Manchester College), and that to the congregation by the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden: There was a good attendance, and several friends had come from neighbouring churches. After tea the welcome meeting was held in the schoolroom. The chair was occupied by Mr. E. J. Bradshaw (president of the congregation) who welcomed the minister on behalf of the Oxford-street Church, Mr. A. Webster (superintendent of the Sunday School) gave the welcome on behalf of that institution. The Rev. Travers Herford on behalf of the N. and E. Lancashire Mission, and the Rev. A. W. Fox on behalf of the ministers of the district. The Rev. Jesse Hatten (Baptist), Accrington, extended the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the Accrington ministers, and there also spoke the Rev. J. Evans, of Colne; Jenkyn Thomas of Rawtenstall; H. Dawtrey, of Higher Broughton; and Councillor Cameron; Mr. D. Harrison, Padiham; and Mr. Mackie, Burnley. There were also present at the afternoon service besides those mentioned the Revs. J. E. Jenkins, of Padiham; E. E. Jenkins, of Walmsley; J. Morgan Whiteman, of Burnley; the Rev. Charles Williams (Baptist); and the Rev. Mr. Backhouse (Superintendent of the Wesleyan circuit), Accrington. Solos were sung in the evening by members of the choir. An organ recital was given by the organist, Mr. Ingham, during the interval between the two meetings. Splendid weather prevailed, and the meetings were very successful, and of good hope for the future.

Bolton: Bank-street (Jubilee Re union).—In further celebration of the Jubilee of the present Bank-street Chapel a most successful re-union was held in the Bath Assembly Rooms on Wednesday evening, October 3. There was a very large attendance, close upon 600 tickets having been sold, and had the accommodation allowed, many more would have been there. The chapel was built towards the close of the long ministry of the late Rev. Franklin Baker, which extended over more than forty years, and it was a very happy feature of the meeting that all of his successors in the Bank-street pulpit were present at this jubilee gathering, the Revs. Jeffery Worthington (1864-73), C. C. Coe (1874-95), C. J. Street (1896-1903), and J. H. Weatherall, the present minister. Mr. John Harwood, J.P., chairman of the chapel committee, presided, and offered a very cordial welcome to their three former ministers. In his retrospect of the past fifty years, he referred to the two daughter churches of their congregation, Unity and the more recent Halliwell-road, which he hoped before long would be as successfully established as Unity. He appealed especially to the rising generation to take a full share, not only in public work, but in the work of their church. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington recalled many happy memories of the old days of his ministry in Bolton, which had been his first charge, and the names of many faithful friends, especially the late Robert Heywood, once Mayor of Bolton, a man held in the highest regard by the whole community. He mentioned that in his own induction service John James Tayler, James Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, and William Gaskell, all took part. At his first baptismal service 22 children were christened, many of them having waited some time for that occasion. The Rev. C. C. Coe also gave some reminiscences of his twenty years' work in Bolton, and the Rev. C. J. Street referred to the last ten years of his ministry, seven of which were in Bolton, as the happiest in his life. They had, he said, a grand and glorious history. It was almost a new civilisation that existed to-day from that which existed when the church was built, and only a few remained of those who were present at the opening of the building. Men come and go; generations come and go; but the church remained with its history, its obligations, and its noble possibilities, and he for one rejoiced to have had some part in a church which had stood for high and noble principles as that church had in the past. Every church which, like that, had been faithful to its trust—had worked for the redemption of the earthly city—had unconsciously prepared for a brighter future. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, who was the last speaker, said they at Bank-street had received the torch undimmed from their noble predecessors, and he urged them to see that it was kept flaming and shedding its light around. He thanked Mr. John Harwood and the committee and other helpers towards the success of that gathering.

Brighton.—The last of the pleasant rambles organised in connection with the church this season was made the occasion of friendly intercourse with the neighbouring congregation at Lewes. Twenty-six people from Brighton joined a number of the Lewes friends at tea, after a lovely walk over the Downs. The winter season of fortnightly Wednesday evening meetings began with a very sociable and well attended Social, and is to continue with lectures, children's meetings, social evenings, &c. The Reading Circle will shortly hold its first meeting this winter with a discussion of Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia."

Capel-y-fadfa (Opening of New Chapel).—With the quarterly meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association on Wednesday and Thursday, October 3 and 4, was connected the celebration of the formal opening of the new chapel, which has been built at a cost of £1,200, of which something like £300 remains still to be raised. The new chapel was greatly admired by all who attended the meetings. To the great regret of the Welsh ministers, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who had been expected, was unable to be present. The first meeting commenced at 7 p.m. on Wednesday, when Rev. T. A. Thomas introduced the service by reading and prayer, and the Revs. Simon Jones and J. P. Kane preached. On Thursday morning the Rev. J. Davis conducted the devotional part and the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones delivered the Association sermon. A public meeting was held in the afternoon, Captain Davies, the president of the Association, taking the chair. The Rev. D. G. Rees, Bridgend, read suitable selections from Scripture and prayed, and the following spoke:—Revs. T. Thomas, R. J. Jones (on behalf of the B. & F.U.A.), W. James, J.P., J. Davies, L. Williams, R. Prydderch (Congregational), Mr. M. Evans (Congregational), Mr. Davies, the architect, and the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, minister of the chapel. It was a very interesting meeting. Both ministers and laymen spoke in high terms of the unflagging effort of the present minister, and congratulated the congregation on their possession of such a spacious and beautiful chapel. In the evening the Rev. D. R. Davies took the introductory service, and Revs. J. Hathren Davies and R. J. Jones preached. Throughout the congregations were very large, the sermons very helpful, and the singing most inspiring. The collections taken on behalf of building fund amounted to £15. As the congregation is mostly composed of small-farm holders and peasants, it is to be hoped that the existing debt will be cleared shortly so as not to hamper the good work.

Chester.—On Sunday, October 7, the Rev. D. Jenkyn Evans commenced his ministry at Matthew Henry's Chapel. The occasion was also used for the Harvest Thanksgiving. The evening congregation was unusually large, and the collections also larger than usual.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.—In addition to the services otherwise noted we have reports of successful services from Belfast, at the Stanhope-street Mission, where the Rev. Eustace Thompson is at work; Bermondsey, where Mr. Jesse Hipperson was the preacher; Chorley (Rev. W. T. Bushrod); and Rhydygwin and Ciliau Aeron, where the Rev. Lewis Williams conducted the services, and the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, was the special preacher.

Hinckley.—A very successful social gathering was held in the Great Meeting schoolroom on Wednesday, October 3, to inaugurate the Winter Session of the Literary Class, and also to distribute the prizes to the members of the Young Women and Young Men's Sunday Afternoon Classes, gained during the last half-year. Mr. Thomas Jennings, the chairman of the Chapel Committee, distributed the prizes, and said how much the members were indebted to the Rev. T. J. Jenkins and Mrs. Jenkins, the conductors of the classes. The large audience (which filled the schoolroom) were delighted with a humorous operetta, given by the members of the singing class under the leadership of Mr. H. P. Atkins.

Leeds: Hunslet (Appointment).—The Rev. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D., late Hibbert Scholar, and a student of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, has been appointed minister of the Unitarian Chapel, Hunslet, and assistant minister to the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—The first meeting of the 21st session of the Rathbone Literary Club was held in the Church Hall on October 4. There was a varied programme, which included an address by the president, vocal and instrumental music, and refreshments. Mr. Herbert Rathbone, the president, in the course of his address, discussed the scope and purpose of a literary club. He said such a club might do much to educate public opinion. Several extracts from teachers in Liverpool schools were quoted showing the increasing use which the scholars made of the public library. A vote of thanks was moved by Colonel Goffey, who said that the reading of light literature might become the herald of a higher class of study. Mr. W. H. Thomas, who seconded, spoke of the early days of the Rathbone Club, of which he was an original member. A vote of thanks to the artists was moved by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, and seconded by Mr. A. W. Blundell, the secretary. The evening was greatly enjoyed.

London: Hackney.—A bazaar will be held at the King's Hall, Holborn Restaurant, on June 5 and 6, 1907, to celebrate the jubilee of the present new Gravel Pit Church, the foundation-stone of which was laid in 1857, and to augment the guarantee fund. Mrs. W. Blake Odgers has very kindly undertaken to organise a stall, to which the Unitarian Churches in London will be asked to contribute, and it is hoped that the numerous friends, in all parts of the country, who have been in the past connected with Hackney, will give what help they can to make the bazaar a success. Contributions of money or goods will be gratefully received by the hon. secretary and treasurer, Miss Whitehead, 63, The Common, Upper Clapton, N.E. Last winter a musical service was held on the last Sunday evening of every month, and as time went on these services were appreciated more and more. The first of a new series was held on Sunday week, and the results of the work of the organist and choir were excellent. There was a good congregation. On that day, also, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith's magazine, Unity, adapted for local purposes, made its first appearance at the church. There is to be a gratuitous circulation of 1,000 copies monthly.

Manchester: Broughton.—On Monday evening, October 8, the Band of Hope began its winter's work. The programme included a ten minutes' address by the Rev. H. Dawtre, and several pledges were signed at the close. Mr. Wm. Hough was chairman. The harvest thanksgiving services on the previous day, conducted by Mr. Dawtre, were eminently successful.

Newport, Mon.—On Thursday evening, the 4th inst., the members and adherents of the Unitarian Free Christian Church held a social gathering, to take leave of the Rev. George Critchley. It was under the direction and guidance of Mr. Critchley that the congregation was organised upon a membership basis, and whatever degree of success has been achieved by the young church is very largely due to his able ministry. The president, Mr. W. Pritchard, and several members expressed their appreciation of Mr. Critchley's work; after which Mrs. Banks made the presentation of a fine enlarged portrait, framed in oak, and suitably inscribed, as a mark of the regard and esteem in which he is held by the congregation. In replying, Mr. Critchley spoke of the pleasure it had given him to be at Newport, and to see the steady progress of the movement. He appealed for a continuance of earnest effort on the part of the congregation, and assured them that he would watch their future progress with the deepest interest.

Northampton (Welcome Meeting).—The Rev. E. A. Voysey was welcomed as minister of the Unitarian Church at a largely attended and very cordial congregational meeting on Monday evening, October 8. Mr. James Jackson presided, and Mr. John Sale read letters of apology for absence from the Rev. Charles Voysey (father of the new minister), the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Several members spoke in support of the welcome, and were followed in a brotherly speech by the Rev. C. S. Larkman, of the Abington-avenue Congregational Church. The Revs. Joseph Wood and Rowland Hill, as neighbouring ministers, also spoke, and Mr. Voysey responded to the welcome, Mrs. Voysey also adding a few words of grateful thanks.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Following the harvest festival services on Sept. 30, conducted by the Rev. R. H. Maister, minister, a cantata, "Sowing and Reaping," was admirably rendered by the choir on Monday evening, Oct. 1. On Friday, Oct. 5, the quarterly conference of the Tee-side Union of Sunday Schools and Guilds was held, when a paper was read by Mrs. Lambelle, Middlesbrough, on "Practical work for the Guild." The paper contained a number of excellent suggestions of work for guild members, e.g., work among crippled children, amongst the blind, sick visiting, look-out work, &c. Mrs. Lambelle specially emphasised the need for more thorough and persistent work among young women.

"A plain statement of the Unitarian faith has long been needed. The question, 'What Do Unitarians Believe and Teach' is now constantly asked, and it would be impossible to answer it more shortly or more simply than it is answered in the 'Twelve Replies' which form a small volume recently published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week the first half of the address given by Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, at the opening of the new session. The rest will appear in next week's INQUIRER, which will also contain a full report of the autumn meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Leeds and Bradford.

DR. CROTHERS preaches to-morrow (Sunday) at Manchester College, Oxford, October 28 being his last Sunday at Essex Church. During the week he will be at Glasgow and Newcastle-on-Tyne lecturing, and on Tuesday week, Oct. 30, after the Council meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, there will be a farewell meeting at Essex Hall, with tea and coffee at 8 o'clock, and an address by Dr. Crothers at 8.45. Members of the Council and of the Association in and near London will receive personal invitations, but the committee will cordially welcome any other friends who desire to be present.

THE Congregational Union at the beginning of its autumnal meeting at Wolverhampton on Tuesday sent a telegram of congratulation to Dr. John Clifford on his seventieth birthday: "Heartiest congratulations from the Assembly of the Congregational Union. We rejoice in all your unstinted labours. May God spare you for long and crown your years with benediction." The President, the Rev.

J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham, delivered his address on "The Ministry of a Transfigured Home." He strongly emphasised the paramount importance of religious teaching in the home, and warned his hearers against the too prevalent danger of debasing the ideal of marriage and home.

In a subsequent paper on "The Ideal Ministry" Dr. Forsyth said that it must be not only positive in its gospel, but flexible in its thought. It must always be preparing a new theology for the old faith. It must learn how to express the old reality in terms of the new age. It must speak the word of God in the language of the time. It must not be, in Milton's words, "stupidly good." It must read the signs of society and the thought of civilisation. He pleaded for an educated ministry. The preacher who sneered at theology in public should receive no further attention from the church. There were some signs that they were growing careless of an educated ministry, and were trusting to milk-food, mother-wit, and amateur work. It was for the age a fatal mistake. An amateur ministry ended in an ignorant priesthood. To dread the priesthood and yet to staff the churches with amiable illiterates or smart amateurs was absurd. They could never thrive on a mere impressionist pulpit, which produced effects but mangled truth, and which made conversions but no convictions. In conclusion, he bade them remember that one in every 37 in this country—so plethorically rich—was a pauper. The ideal ministry must let that rankle, and make it rankle. They must not be impatient. Impatience was weakness. But they must never be content. And they must be vigilant, so long as they watched unto prayer and the ministration of the word.

THE following resolution on the Congo atrocities, moved by Dr. G. S. Barrett, of Norwich, was carried with acclamation:—"That this meeting expresses its deep sense of indignation at the barbarities inflicted upon the natives of the Congo, and denounces, as contrary to the elementary rights of humanity, and as a violation of the Berlin Act, the principles introduced and enforced by the Congo Administration; it protests against King Leopold's repudiation of international control, and, recalling the declaration made by the present Foreign Secretary in the Congo debate in the House of Commons on June 9, 1904, 'that none of the great Powers should be content, in view of their own honour, to sit still and do nothing,' urges upon His Majesty's Government to utilise immediately the uttermost resources of British diplomacy with a view to the convocation of the Powers responsible for the creation of the Congo State."

A SILENT vote in commemoration of the late Sir Wilfred Lawson was passed at the annual meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance in Manchester on Tuesday, and Mr. Leif Jones, M.P., was warmly welcomed as the president. At the evening demonstration in the Free Trade Hall Mr. L. V. Harcourt, M.P., presided, and recalled the former chairmanship of his father, Sir William Harcourt. The present Government, he said, had a peremp'ory mandate to deal with temperance reform and a time limit, and such, he believed, would be the main and early part of the Government's work to which they would devote themselves in next year's session with earnestness and determination. Let them all unite to make their country sober and prosperous, temperate and moral, self-respecting, and so aid the mightiest engine for the regeneration of the race. The new president, who moved the resolution of the evening, dealing with the Direct Veto and other matters of temperance reform, had a very hearty reception.

THE first Conference of the United Methodist Church (such is the name to be given to the amalgamated Free Methodists, New Connexion, and Bible Christians), is to be held in a building not belonging to either of the three uniting churches, but in City-road Chapel, which will be kindly lent for the occasion by the Wesleyans.

As the time approaches for the fateful elections in the Transvaal, we welcome any indication of the motives which animate the South Africans. The Transvaal National Association has issued a manifesto which sets forth its aims and hopes. "It is our privilege to share in the heritage of the British Empire, its institutions, and its traditions," thus would the Association escape from all bitter memories of the late war. "It is no less our privilege and duty to secure within the wide scope of these institutions conditions which should be as congenial to Dutch as to English traditions. We have to make a nation, a white nation, neither English nor Dutch, but South African, fit to take its place beside the Canadian and Australian nations, and yielding true and loyal allegiance to our great Empire."

This great thought is the basis of political faith. In the light of it, it is interesting to read the particular points of policy on which attention is focussed. First we notice the reference to Chinese labour: the importation is to be stopped, and those who are already in the mines are to be repatriated at the end of their term of servitude. Then as to the black men, the Association recognise the "duty of promoting the interests of the native races by making provision for their development and civilisation, and adopting a just and consistent policy towards them." But there is talk of confining them to certain locations, and we desire further information; e.g., a premature "civilisation" is exactly one of the things from which they need to be protected. With regard to the white man, the Association lays down a long list of demands, among which several relate to conditions of labour. Improvement in the condition of mines and factories is certainly much needed; shortened hours of labour and the appointment of a Minister of Labour are also called for. On the financial question the manifesto is radical in tone. Changes of taxation are to cheapen the necessities of life, and to be transferred from indirect tax on commodities to direct tax on income. A change in the mining and company law is also proposed which shall give to the people their share in the mineral wealth of the country.

"SWORD AND TROWEL" is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, a sermon preached in Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on September 30, "the last day of thirty years' ministry." The sermon, which begins the fifteenth annual volume of the Mill Hill Pulpit, is full of autobiographical interest. Mr. Hargrove tells of his passage from early evangelical faith through the Anglican fold to that of Rome, and then after ten years of strenuous submission out once more on to the ocean of speculation and doubt, until finally he found his feet resting upon the rock of fundamental truth.

"I have discovered the foundations for which I have been feeling all my life, upon which men build their various systems of religion, useful all of them as refuges for weary or aspiring souls, not content or capable without some such covert and support. I would not abolish any of them were it in my power, leaving homeless those who found therein peace and consolation. Rather would I, if I could, establish, purify, enlighten, every temple in which the Highest was sought and worshipped. I would not strive, I would not presume even to pray, that all men should believe as I believe and worship in the manner which commends itself to me. I would only that all should be free, and respect the freedom of their neighbours otherwise minded to themselves, and all seek to know and to do the Will of the Father in Heaven. To this have I come as the end of all my wanderings, and have girt me as with the mason's apron and taken the trowel in hand and buckled sword to my side. And this is what I have made it my life's work to uphold and defend—that the Infinite in whom we move 'as motes in summer sky' is conscious of us as is a father of his little children, that the All Mighty is All Loving, that whatever is good and beautiful in earth or man is of His shining there, that evil is the shadow which hides Him from us and like a shadow must pass away. I attack no man, no church, but if any doctrine or denial impugn this faith I count myself called to defend it.

* * * *

"And now I begin anew, an old man who came here young. I may yet have ten years work before me, probably much less. But I vow my best to you whom I have so long served, and to the cause of religion, of liberty, of progress, which has hitherto commanded my highest efforts and inspired all my labours. Soon my name will be added to the list of the Mill Hill ministers of the past! May it be worthy of its place in no mean company! And may my successors and all who come after, differing as they will in opinion from those who have gone before, maintain always the same unchanging faith in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man!"

The preachers at the Sunday morning service in Manchester College Chapel during term (the Principal preached last Sunday) are to be:—October 21, the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D.; October 28, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A.; November 4, 11, and 18, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D.; November 25, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A.; December 2, the Rev. Joseph Wood; December 9, the Principal. On the three Sundays when Dr. Hunter is to preach he will also hold a special evening service at 8.30, when he will give addresses on "The Opportunity of Life," "The War of Life," "The Joy of Life."

THE VAN MISSION.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding writes in reference to his letter of last week, correcting the address of the treasurer. Chesham should be omitted, and it should read: Rev. J. M. Bass, 15, Malvern-street, Bury, Lancs.

CHILDREN'S VESPER HYMN.

O FATHER who art everywhere,
We pray Thee listen to our prayer.

We thank Thee for Thy loving care
Throughout the day,
And while we pass through the dark hours
Be Thou our stay.

We pray Thee give us grateful hearts
For all Thy love;
Grant we may rest when life is past
With Thee above.

And for to-morrow's many needs
To Thee we pray,
Sure that Thy loving care is ours
Throughout Life's day.

Help us to be as Jesus was—
So pure and good,
Ready and willingly to do
All that we should.

And if through death's dark vale we pass,
We shall not fear,
For Thou, Eternal Light of Lights, Art ever near.

"SISTER NORA."

LONDON CITIZEN SUNDAY.

OCTOBER 28, 1906.

THE Citizen Sunday Committee have issued a preliminary list of the clergy and ministers of all denominations who have undertaken to observe this day. The following are passages from their appeal:—

London does not merely offer for solution the problems offered by all great cities, such as the evils of overcrowding, the existence of a "submerged tenth," the want of conditions which are necessary for physical health, alcoholism, growing rates and rents, the misery caused by the gambling mania, and other evils incidental to the present transitional stage in the development of urban life. It has all these evils in a condensed state, and on a colossal scale. It has also peculiar difficulties of its own. We would single out one for your special consideration.

What makes the call to civic duty more urgent in London than elsewhere is that its voice is in danger of being lost, through the remoteness of its Government from the daily life of its citizens. The Parish—the commune—has been absorbed in a larger area in which a bureaucracy may find congenial soil. A Borough Council, a Poor Law Union, a County Council constituency are objects often so remote, that the ordinary citizen has come to take but a languid interest in them. He needs, therefore, to be reminded of the whole of which he is a part—his imagination has to be stimulated, and some pride in London has to be cultivated so that he may realise the responsibility of his vote.

Nor is it necessary for us to point out that the possession of a vote, and its employment, does not exhaust the requirements of good citizenship. As is the citizen so is the government under which he lives. If he is self-centred, absorbed in material interests and careless of the larger life, he will live under a government of red-tape, of narrow views, and of possible corruption.

While, therefore, hoping that you will join us in emphasising the duty of each citizen to exercise conscientiously his right of voting in the triennial elections of Borough Councillors this year, and of County Councillors next, we also venture to invite you to press home the duty incumbent on each citizen to show the close relation there is between his religious life and the life of society. We are convinced that the upward progress of life in London depends on the strenuousness with which thoughtful religious men and women insist that the social environment shall help and not hinder man's pursuit of what is good.

PROFESSOR J. E. B. MAYOR, senior Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, described as "not only an ardent vegetarian, but a hale and hearty man at eighty-two years of age," presided on Monday at the annual meeting of the Vegetarian Society in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. The simplicity, wholesomeness, and economy of vegetarian diet received ample illustration in the course of the meeting.

ROTHERHAM BICENTENARY.

NONCONFORMIST worship in Rotherham goes back for more than two hundred years, for two clergymen, John Shawe and Luke Clayton, were ejected from the parish church in 1662, but continued to hold meetings for worship in the town and neighbourhood, and the latter took out a licence under the King's Indulgence of 1672. The first stated minister, after the Toleration Act, was John Heywood, son of the famous Oliver, and it was in the time of the third minister, John Wadsworth, that the first chapel was built. 1706 is the date on a stone in the porch, taken to be the date of its opening, and the congregation now worshipping in the Church of Our Father, opened in 1880, during the ministry of the Rev. William Blazeby, have therefore celebrated their bicentenary as from that date. Mr. Blazeby has prepared a full and richly illustrated account of the old chapel and its ministers, and many other matters, to commemorate the bicentenary, from which the above particulars are taken.

A service of commemoration was held in the church on Thursday, October 11, conducted by the Revs. William Blazeby and William Stephens, the present minister, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, from the text, Gal. vi. 9, 10. "Let us not be weary in well doing," &c.

After tea in the Masonic Hall, a meeting was held in the schoolroom, which was crowded. Mr. Andrew Thompson, chairman of the Hollis Trustees, presided, and was supported by the Revs. W. Blazeby, C. Hargrove, C. J. Street, W. Copeland Bowie, John Ellis, H. Thomas, A. Dolphin, and W. Stephens, and a number of leading laymen. After an address of welcome and reminiscence by the chairman, Mr. Stephens proposed a resolution of special welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Blazeby, to whom, he said, they must give the place of honour in their programme of that evening.

The Rev. W. BLAZEBY, who was minister at Rotherham from 1860 to 1894, in acknowledging the welcome, gave an address full of happy memories and amusing stories of old times. He spoke of Jacob Brettell, his predecessor, who was minister from 1816 to 1859, and was something of a poet; and, among other things, told of how, when he first came to Rotherham, the music at chapel was led by a string quartette, and of his own temerity in agitating for an organ.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE then gave an address on "Our Religious Ancestry," and the Rev. C. J. STREET proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Bowie for his services, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for their support to the Bicentenary Movement. (That was for the raising of £250 to meet the expenses of renovating the church). Mr. Bowie, he said, was a type of the Unitarianism they wanted to-day. The Unitarian Association had the hearty support of the Yorkshire churches.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE responded, and went on to speak of "The Theological Outlook." Theological thought in England, he said, was in a state of great bewilderment and unsettlement. They, as Unitarians, claimed that by facing the whole situation with perfect openness, with a desire simply to know the truth, men would obtain a faith that would help them to lead the highest and best life that was possible, and that would bring to them a faith in God, a reverence for all they meant by religion. They must get close to human life, read their own hearts, watch the movement of their own minds, in their higher and better moments, and also when they were in the depths. Let them go forward and face the future, confident that all was well with them, and he believed there was a great and glorious future before those churches of theirs, few, small, and struggling though they might be. They must keep their minds open for every gleam of truth that might come to them, from whatever quarter, and keep their hearts full of the teaching of love and duty.

A vote of thanks was also passed to the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and acknowledged by the Rev. A. Dolphin. A vote of thanks to the chairman and a few words from the Rev. W. Stephens brought the meeting to a close.

THE theological colleges continue to gravitate towards the centres of University education. The latest instance is that of the Western College, founded so long ago as 1752, which now after a century and a half of useful history is planted in Bristol. Thus will this training school for Congregational ministers, set down near by the University College buildings, offer to its students the opportunity of growing familiar not only with the best thought of the age, but with the actual conditions under which the millions live and toil.

THE Sunday morning services at Cambridge, conducted by Unitarian ministers at 10, Emmanuel-street, began again for the new term last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The sermon, which will appear in the November Coming Day, was on "How Man makes God," showing how the character and capacity of men largely determine their conception of God. The appeal therefore was for the elevation of human thought and life, and for freedom to let it grow. "If, then, men can themselves become wiser and better in the future, they will attain to wiser and better thoughts of God: and, doubtless, it will be so. Many of these clouds that shroud the glorious presence will disappear: and men will as much rejoice in His fatherly love as they have trembled before His imperial wrath. . . . If ever we are to be utterly rid of the dreadful ideas of past ages—ideas that turn God into an unlovely, self-willed, inexorable man—it will only be through the elevation of the human mind by an increase of light: for, in the world of mind and spirit, as in the world of matter—it is the light that kindles life; it is the light that makes all things new. Slowly that most blessed change is coming—slowly like all the great changes that mark stages in the life of the race: but the process may be discerned by watchful eyes; and even now this long-depressed humanity is ready for its glorious King."

TENNYSON'S "GRAIL."

SIR,—In awaiting further possible comments from your readers on the problem of the "Grail," I have delayed the very pleasant duty of thanking Mr. Thomas for his most sympathetic and suggestive treatment (in your issue of the 15th ult.) of my essay. Had I no more to say, I should feel impelled to ask your courtesy to aid mine in recording this much. There are, however, one or two points on which I cannot have made myself clear, and one or two on which I cannot see with Mr. Thomas, and I shall be grateful for your further indulgence in allowing me to point these out.

Mr. Thomas says I "wander off along a by-path of speculation." What I really did was, despairing of an internal reconciliation of the oppositions in the poem, to attempt that reconciliation by approaching the poem externally, as, from Tennyson's own admissions, it seemed to exist in his mind. If this is speculation, I must plead guilty. In his "Life" we find that he put forward the poem as his "view," deliberate and final, "of the spiritual world"; and it seemed to me that, as the spiritual world certainly has manifested itself to men of extraordinary temperament by "signs and wonders" not to be explained by physical process, the poet was making the "grail" to stand for that side of the spiritual life of man—viewed collectively and as a whole.

It is a phase of the spiritual life which I have never myself experienced, and I confess to requiring overwhelming evidence before accepting any alleged manifestation of it. Further, inasmuch as it condescends to a sensuous medium, it is unquestionably lower in the scale than that purely inward conviction by which the Arthurs of the world live and work. All the same, there can be no question that it exists and actuates and has actuated many righteous achievements; and this being so, no poem treating of the spiritual world could be complete without giving it place.

Further, this view seemed to me to fall in happily with the conception of the "grail" which is consistently treated as an outward thing: Mr. Thomas's alternative suggestion as to the significance of the holy vessel is Humility. That is a very beautiful thought, and there is no doubt about the place which Tennyson assigns humility in his spiritual scheme. But the quality of humility, so entirely internal, would seem oddly and somewhat clumsily expressed by the "grail." Moreover, the King did not see the "grail," whereas no one can deny him humility even as a dramatis persona, let alone the fact that his standing for "religious faith" (on Tennyson's own confession) would be incompatible with his lack of it.

Again, is Mr. Thomas quite justified in saying that none of the other Knights "saw the Grail in any serviceable way?" (the italics are his). Let me observe in passing that Mr. Thomas takes his account of what happened from the King's lips, and does not make allowances for dramatic bias. The King had, at the beginning, prophesied dark things, and when they came true it was but natural he should "rub the lesson in"—the lesson that signs and wonders are not to be gone after at the expense of duty. We must draw our knowledge of what really happened not from the King, but from the poem; and there we find that Sir Bors certainly not only saw the vision, but saw it in a "serviceable way"—saw it when his soul lay captive in the stony fastness of materialism. Among a people who cut the ground from beneath him by denying the very existence of the spiritual, the "vision" came to him, bringing freedom and power. As I tried to point out in my second paper, it may be in some such way as this that this lower phase of spiritual appeal has its function; and when we gethink ourselves of the dull materialistic ages which an access of spirituality has buckened and redeemed, and of the arresting and violent nature of the spirituality so manifested, it seems as though the incident of Sir Bors—so often overlooked amid the more enthralling movements of the poem—were also "an image of the mighty world."

I will not further trespass upon your space, except to say how entirely I concur in the catholic metaphor with which Mr. Thomas closes his comment. It is the many colours of the prism that give us the index of our parent fire, and so it is with all light and thought and truth. I make no further claim in this as in aught else than to contribute one of them.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

SIR,—I welcome Mr. Edwin Armstrong's letter to you on the subject of Social Reform. I wish he would give us his own idea as to the best remedy for the evils very imperfectly sketched in the article he criticises. He suggests we must seek a little further for our answer. Where will he direct us?

To turn to his criticisms, I have made inquiries during the past few days, and find that my information as to an agreement among some colliery owners to keep up the price of coal and, rather than reduce prices, to run short time was quite correct, and that "into this particular district—which I will give Mr. Armstrong if he desires—quantities of coal from other districts have been brought in consequence. My informant points out that while the price of house coal in small quantities has increased in that neighbourhood 3s. 4d. to 5s. per ton, miners' wages are unchanged since 1893. I did not suggest that of the price (20s. per ton) which the Londoner pays, 17s. 6d. went into the colliery owners' pockets, nor did I attempt any such analysis, railway carriage and delivery, royalties and wayleaves, would all have to be taken into consideration. The figure of 2s. 6d. per ton, "paid in wages for raising the coal," was obtained by me some years ago, from the Wigan district out of a price of 6s. to 6s. 6d., then being obtained for coal at the pit bank. I have not verified this reference since, and it may well be both antiquated and local. I accept Mr.

Edwin Armstrong's better informed correction. But he, in his turn leaves out an important consideration when he makes average cost, including only wages and material, to be 7s. and 8s., and prices obtainable 8s. What about the royal ties? I had occasion some years ago to examine the accounts of a Yorkshire Colliery Company, and I found an agreement to pay royalty on a large quantity of coal "cut or uncut," such royalty amounting, if my memory serves me correctly, in that particular year to £60,000. Toll of this sort levied on the industry for permission to take out of the earth something which the "owner" did not place there, will account for some of the difference.

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE long summer vacation, which our crowded, strenuous American life makes more and more necessary, does not yield much material worthy to be reported in your columns. Our larger town and city churches are closed because of the general absence of their parishioners, or combine for union services, conducted by a long series of itinerant ministers, and indifferently attended. Parish activities are generally suspended till the autumn. At seaside and mountain resorts special summer services are more successful; along the mountainous coasts of Maine, especially, a line of Unitarian chapels is gradually being built, and the summer worship often grows into a permanent all-the-year-round parish with a settled minister. Your correspondent visited this summer for the first time the summer services held annually for fifteen years past on the Isles of Shoals, a group of low rock-bound islets some ten miles off the shores of New Hampshire, within two hours of Boston. Though but a few acres in extent and covered with precarious verdure, there is something wonderfully picturesque and inspiring in these little patches of rock rising out of the bosom of the ocean, swept for ever by its tides, and surmounted with long rambling structures of wood and stone, where for a few months every summer some thousands of tired, jaded mortals find coolness, refreshment, and peace. At night a great lighthouse sweeps its watchful eye across land and sea, and the sea-gulls blend their shrill cries with the eternal roar of the ocean as it breaks on the splintered rocks in long breakers and flying spray. Celia Thaxter, the daughter of the light-house keeper, and one of the best of the minor poets of America, has celebrated in her verse the fascination of these isles, which not only hold a wondrous variety of charms within their narrow limits, but as the scene of one of the earliest settlements of the American coast, have many a romantic and adventurous story to tell of the wild, turbulent deeds of the fishermen, smugglers, and buccaneers who were their first inhabitants. Here for years past our Unitarian people have held a two weeks' session devoted to religion in word and deed. Its old stone church, generously shared with other denominations, has come into their possession, and together with the halls and spacious verandahs of the hotels, serves as an auditorium for the large congregations which gather every morning and evening for study and for worship. The procession which at nine o'clock every evening winds up the rocky paths to the little church, each person carrying a lantern to light the way, and later to be hung on a peg to light the interior, is a picturesque sight not to be forgotten, reminding one of the pious peasants of Normandy bearing their lighted candles to the sacred shrine.

At Nantucket, a larger island with a permanent population and several churches, our Unitarians hold each summer a similar session. At Chautauqua, in the State of New York, a great religious summer colony under Methodist auspices, and the pioneer of many similar gatherings, throughout the States, our Unitarians have now a building and library to serve as a centre for those of our faith who congregate there, and to impart information to inquiring minds concerning our doctrines and aims. In lower Illinois, in the region once known, because of the density of its ignorance and the wickedness of its life, as "Egypt," our brave, self-sacrificing missionary Jasper L. Douthitt holds every summer, in a beautifully wooded and watered grove, his Unitarian Chautauqua, Lithia Springs. Here the farmers and shopkeepers from fifty miles about, to the number of hundreds, come eagerly with their families to camp, and rest, and listen and learn, while bright and entertaining speakers and artists, under the trees, or in the large auditorium and chapel, instruct, entertain, and edify them. Dedicated to temperance, purity, knowledge, good citizenship and a free and inclusive religion, such meetings fulfil a beneficent ministry in the lives of our American people.

On October 1, the Unitarian Clergy hereabout gather for a four days' session of their Minister's Institute at Petersham, a lovely hill-top town in Central Massachusetts. The proprietor of the large summer hotel in the village has invited them to be his guests. There will be addresses and papers by Prof. Toy, of Harvard; Revs. W. H. Lyon, J. Metcalf, W. R. Lord, J. C. Perkins, John Cuckson, C. G. Ames, and M. St. Clair Wright. Every afternoon will be devoted to the informal discussion of new books, by Profs. Höfding, Ladd, Schmidt, Wernle, Weinle, Foster, and Pfeiderer.

You have already in your columns given an account of the impressive exercises at Plymouth, Mass., in celebration of the 300th anniversary of the founding of the Church of the Pilgrims at Scrooby, England: This church, afterwards transplanted from Leyden, Holland, to these shores, has become the venerable mother of a mighty host of Christian congregations in America, and by an equally providential ordaining has itself become Unitarian in its theology and fellowship. You will pardon my mentioning these familiar details. Yet they may not be altogether familiar to some of your readers. Before a committee of Unitarians, in session at their National Conference, not long since there suddenly appeared a much-bewildered Briton who inquired: "Where will John Cuckson be, now? days?"

"He made an address at the Conference this morning. You will probably find him at the hotel."

"Oh, aye, indeed? But I mean, you know, where does he preach and live?"

"He is pastor of the Old Pilgrim Church in Plymouth, Mass., the spot where the Puritans first landed when they came from Scrooby, England, and from Holland to this country."

"Indeed? But that will be a long way inland."

I tried to make the matter clear to my British friend, who, I fear, was not much enlightened after all.

Our British brethren have so many good, and no doubt true, stories to tell at the expense of our Yankee invaders of their country that I rather relish the chance of getting even for once.

Your recent representative among us, Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, won all hearts by his geniality and genuineness of nature, and the admirable tact and humour of his addresses. The most interesting occasion on which the writer heard him was at the meeting of the Ministers' Union, an Association formed in 1895 by 30 or 40 ministers, representing six or seven different denominations. Its purpose, as given in its articles, is: "This Union seeks to promote the oneness of all believers, especially by cherishing the largest good will among all ministers." Furthermore it is provided that "All ministers shall be considered members of the Union, equally and in full, while they attend its meetings."

The last session was held in our Unitarian King's Chapel in Boston, was presided over by the broad-minded pastor of the First Baptist Church in Boston, and addressed, among others, by the rector of Emmanuel Protestant Episcopal Church. Your Rev. Joseph Wood made a most delightful address, which was warmly received by the 200 ministers present, among whom were some 25 Unitarians.

In referring to this pleasing sign of interdenominational fellowship, I may add that while the National Federation of Christian Churches last year refused to hold fellowship with Unitarians and Universalists, the local New England branches of the Federation have always displayed a most fraternal spirit towards us. Important meetings of its executive committee have been held at the Unitarian Building in Boston, and its secretaries and agents not infrequently attend our Unitarian local conferences to solicit our co-operation.

The same thing is true of the important Religious Education Association, which counts Unitarians on its list of committees.

In the same spirit the local committee in charge of the Boston International Congress of Unitarian and other Religious Liberals has been met by cordial assurances of co-operation by other denominations, such as the Universalists, the progressive Friends, the Christians, and German Liberal Reformed Churches, and by prominent members of so-called orthodox bodies. The arrangements for the Congress next year (September 22-27, 1907) are progressing rapidly and favourably, and soon we hope to announce details. The entire programme of exercises, recreations, and hospitalities has been decided upon, subject to amendment. There is every reason to look forward to a great attendance from all parts of the United States, representing all shades of liberal religious opinion. The only apprehension felt by the committee arises from an uncertainty as to the degree in which they can rely on the attendance of liberals from European and other foreign countries. Their presence and word can alone give the Boston Congress a truly international character, and justify the appeal the committee is making to its American fellow-liberals for their co-operation. If the attendance from abroad were to prove meagre and unrepresentative, in striking contrast with that of previous Congresses, it would be both mortifying to us and a severe blow to the cause of international fellowship among liberals.

For these reasons the committee is watching with deep interest the progress of the minister's holiday movement, so unselfishly and enthusiastically started in England by our fellow-worker Dr. Herbert C. Smith, of London. The success of his plan through the generosity of British laymen would mean much to our Congress—might, indeed, determine its prosperous issue.

In preparation for the Congress, the Unitarian Women's Alliances throughout the United States are studying this winter the history and present state of Liberal Religion in Foreign Countries. A special manual or syllabus for their guidance has been published.

The International Council has been represented by letter and in person this summer at the meetings of the Swiss Verein für freies Christentum, and Die Freunde der Christlichen Welt.

There is reason to believe that the fifth Congress, of 1909, will be held on German soil at either Berlin or Bremen, from both of which places informal invitations have already been received.

Rev. Mr. Tuckerman, grandson of Rev. Joseph Tuckerman, founder of the Ministry-at-large, has just been appointed a missionary of the Benevolent Fraternity in Boston. Mr. Tuckerman is an Episcopalian minister, but is said to be very advanced in his tendencies.

The new Unitarian Year Book for 1906-7, just issued, enumerates 471 churches and 549 ministers; 6 new societies were formed during the year and one disappeared—a net gain of 5. This ratio of progress is not very encouraging on the face of it. But there has been a great deal of solidifying of late in our denominational affairs. Some fine churches have been built, handsome endowments made, and there is a marked advance in every direction of religious activity.

In this connection I may mention the fact that the Year Book of the Protestant Episcopal Churches in this country gives its denominational advance last year as only two per cent., which is the cause of some anxiety to its leaders.

In closing this letter I regret to have to report that our honoured and beloved friend and fellow-worker Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., has not been restored to health, as was hoped, but has been taken by his family, a very sick man, to the home of his son-in-law, Rev. M. O. Simons, of Cleveland, Ohio, where the outcome will be awaited with painful, affectionate interest by a large circle of friends and admirers, both in this country and throughout the world.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XIX.—THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

THERE are words in the Fourth Gospel which seem to show that, to the mind of Christ, there was but one name under which security and unity would ever be possible for his disciples and followers as a whole. They are those in which he prayed: "Holy Father, keep them in Thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be one." The "name" here is the holy name of "Father" revealed to the Son.

If the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch, it was by no choice of their own. They were content to be known as "Galileans," "Nazarenes;" to know themselves as "brethren," "believers," "the saints," "the elect," "the faithful." The nickname given in contempt is now the supreme name for all that is highest in human effort and character and thought. But is it the name that Christ himself would have allowed? Does it breathe the spirit of the prayer: "Keep them in Thy name"?

The moment the Christian name was adopted, Christianity for the first time stood out from Judaism, and was presented as centred in a person, and based upon a life; and from that moment difference began to arise in the doctrine of that person, and also in respect of the actual facts of that life. Hence the history of Christianity in conflict with the world is also a history of Christianity in controversy with itself—now on points of theological statement, and now on questions of historical fact. Is it too bold a thing to say that Christ's religion would to-day be more secure, if Christ's own prayer had been more regarded, "Keep them in Thy name"?

The denominational tendency once indulged, the passion for names knows no bounds. It is a strange process to look back upon—the splitting off of section after section of believers, now on a term, and now on a clause, and now on a theory of government, and now on a question of jurisdiction, and now on an impossible definition, and now on an unnecessary distinction—unity of spirit all torn to shreds by independence of opinion, the unity of the one all-embracing name.

Denominational names are names of restriction. Introduce a new name, which is also a defining term, and you at once challenge every other definition. The token of religious unity, it is true, must be a name, but it should be the name above every name—the name which holds in itself all truth and proportion and right relation, the one name of perfect comprehension which leaves nothing unnamed.

OBITUARY.

MR. HERBERT RIX, B.A.

THE announcement, in our last week's issue, of the death of Mr. Herbert Rix must have brought sadness to many, but surprise to none. Rather to all who knew the facts a feeling of chastened thankfulness would come. The long battle with pain was over, separation from his dearest was ended. We print below the testimony of one of his intimate friends whose words fitly express thoughts shared far and wide. The story of Mr. Rix's life is simple, and may be briefly told. Born December 4, 1850, he was trained at Regent's Park College for the Baptist ministry, and graduated in the London University in 1876. "Regent's Park" in his time was the scene of a theological "scare." Several students were dismissed for heterodoxy, but Mr. Rix, being regarded only as "doubtful," was permitted to remain. At the end of his college course, however, he went to Dr. Angus, then the Principal, and expressed himself unable to enter the Baptist ministry. The issue turned for him, he said, on the point of the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures. Dr. Angus, with wise consideration, gave him two books to read, one on each side of the question. Unfortunately for the good doctor's satisfaction, Mr. Rix was "convinced by the wrong book." The result, however, did not lessen the Principal's esteem, and through his influence Mr. Rix obtained the post of classical tutor at Pontypool Baptist College, where he remained nearly a year.

It proved that the pulpit was not to be closed against him after all. Dr. J. Allanson Picton secured his help as assistant minister at Hackney, and he frequently preached at the Rev. Mark Wilks's chapel at Holloway. His sermons, then and later, when he often took services for Unitarians, were always acceptable to thoughtful and inquiring minds, and his devout nature eminently fitted him for the duties of a religious teacher. But before long he determined not to be dependent on preaching for a living, and, owing to the influence of Dr. Picton and other friends, he was appointed, first upon the clerical staff, and, in 1885, Assistant Secretary to the Royal Society, Burlington House, a post which he efficiently sustained for eleven years.

Mr. Rix was one of those who felt deeply the stirrings of the social revolution which is all too slowly coming to birth in our midst. He allied himself with kindred spirits in the "New Fellowship," with its journal Seedtime, well known years ago to some of our London readers (of which the Fabian Society was an off-shoot), and it cannot be doubted that he gave and received impulses that mould life. In his own case the inspiration of Tolstoy's writings (an author whom he greatly admired) moved him towards the fulfilment of ideals incompatible with official life in London. He purchased a small site at Limpsfield, which he laid out and cultivated, and on which, when he retired from his position at Burlington House, he built "Headland Cottage," the beautiful home in beautiful scenery where he lived and where he died. Here he devoted himself to literary work, and with his young wife lived the life of neighbourly service with the villagers and of delightful intercourse with a choice circle of friends.

The permanent fruit of his thought remains in several collections of discourses, and notably in the volume "A Dawning Faith," which was published in 1903, and a review of which appeared in our columns. In these discourses, which were originally given to the Croydon Ethical and Religious Fellowship, the evidence is clear that, though he had now gone far from the position when the one questionable point was "the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures," his mind was deeply imbued with religious emotion, while all was held subject to the criticism of a keen philosophic analysis. A very noticeable feature was his earnest attachment to the memory of Jesus. It was this that impelled him, five years ago last spring, in spite of serious physical weakness, to make an extended tour in Palestine, his object being to follow as closely as possible the footsteps of the great prophet of Nazareth. On his return he prepared lectures which displayed the keen interest he took in the subject; but it will be still better displayed in a volume which he did not live to see published, but upon the proofs of which he was at work in his last conscious hours.

Reference has been made to his physical weakness. To the grief of his friends, year by year this gradually increased, though he never seemed to lose hope. "I am again on the mend," he wrote on the morning of Wednesday last week. He had received and enjoyed a visit from one of his closest friends, and then set himself to his proofs again. Before day closed he was at rest.

The funeral services were held at Golder's Green Crematorium on Saturday and Limpsfield Parish Churchyard on Monday. The Revs. Philip Wicksteed and W. J. Jupp took Saturday's service, and on Monday Mr. Jupp, Mr. Maurice Adams and Mr. J. A. Hobson each spoke a few words by the grave concerning their friend and his wife, whose ashes now rest there side by side. The children of the village, who loved them both, brought their silent tribute of flowers. She died on August 21.

A Memorial Service will be held at the Free Christian Church, Croydon, to-morrow (Sunday) morning, conducted by the Rev. W. J. Jupp.

HERBERT AND ALICE RIX.

WHEN first I knew them he was secretary to the Royal Society, and they lived in the spacious official apartments in Burlington House. He was a perfect secretary, showing rare powers of organising and arranging details; and, without belittling diplomacy, he could consult all tastes and consider all susceptibilities, and keep everything in smooth working order. But he was a living refutation of the statement that what we do well we like doing, for he longed to escape from all these things, and to live in philosophical retirement. Not that he sought the life of a hermit, for (in spite of what struck strangers or casual acquaintances as amazing taciturnity) he dearly loved the society of his friends, and he had the most delightful and varied gifts of conversation. But he wanted a simpler life than he was living, at once more contemplative and in directer communion with nature and in closer contact with the more primitive and more essential human relationships. Even the atmosphere of scientific thought in which he lived ministered but slightly to his higher aspirations, for he had no real love of science except in the bearing of its general conclusions upon problems of philosophy. So, though he did his work as perfectly as if his whole heart was in it, and knew exactly what all the scientific world was doing, and could direct any man who wanted information to the source from which he could obtain it, he was for ever longing for freedom to live a life more after his own heart. Of the outward conditions of that life he had formed a somewhat doctrinaire conception. He had built a cottage at Limpsfield, which was in some respects more nearly an artistic symbol of the life he wanted to lead than a practical instrument to enable him to lead it, though even then he made a stand in one respect, and insisted that some of the windows with which he would be most closely personally concerned, should be constructed partly with a view to the people in the room being able to look out of them, and not only with a view to the people outside finding it pleasant to look at them. I think his scheme was to live there with his wife on £100 a year, and to vary sermon writing by cultivating his little plot of land. When his retirement at last came, things worked out somewhat differently. The Society he had served so admirably showed its appreciation by voting him a pension, and he still retained for a time some official duties which necessitated journeys to London and increased his income, so that in one way or another his resources, though modest, were very considerably greater than those on which his ideal scheme had been built. The "simplifications" of his cottage turned out to be productive of many complications both physical and mental, and he used afterwards to express an intention, unhappily never carried out, of writing "The Confessions of a Simplifier." Had he done so it would have been rich in humour and tenderness and wisdom. But what happened at Headland Cottage was not the relinquishing of a foolish dream, it was the realisation of a beautiful and noble ideal. Details and machinery were altered, but ideals were not sacrificed, only brought into closer working relation with reality and purged of all suspicion of preciosity.

It was the Rixes, so to speak, who discovered Limpsfield; and one friend after another, attracted by their presence there, came and pitched their tents near to them. Headland Cottage soon became a centre of philosophic thought and a fountain of spiritual influence of deep, perhaps even of wide significance. Now that he was able to shape his life as he would, Herbert Rix impressed his friends more and more as one who had found for himself, and illustrated for others, a rare harmony between the spheres of thought, emotion, and action. His philosophy, his religion, and his practical conduct of life exercised a steady mutual pressure upon each other, no one of them was allowed to get out of touch with the others; they were seeking and in no small measure finding, a complete harmony, and no one branch of life was allowed to get away from the others and lose its sense of responsibility to them. It was this that gave so strong a sense of reality to all he said and of significance to all he did. But there was no strain; only a steady forward pressure about it all. No one would call him a great preacher, and yet his preaching was great, for every discourse was the record of thought, feeling, and action coming straight from the life of a living man, and so it intimately touched and affected the lives of others. "The stones moved" under his tread.

But Herbert Rix alone could never have made Headland Cottage the temple of joyous and earnest worship of the Spirit of Life that it was. His wife Alice, that Martha and Mary in one, felt, perhaps with less effort and more unflinching instinct than his, the oneness of material and spiritual things. And she had not only wonderful gifts of management and administration, added to keen intellectual insight, but a genuine love of handling the housewife's tools, and dealing with all the material things of which life is built. There was something even better than "plain living and high thinking" in their home; for the phrase suggests an austerity which the wealth and generosity of Alice Rix's nature, and her genuine delight in everything that she handled, precluded. But one felt that there was nothing to eat, to drink, to touch or to look at that was not spontaneously and inevitably doing its full share in supporting the life of the spirit that pervaded the house. The feeling of unity superseded the contrasts and distinctions which only come into prominence when there is war of some kind between sense and soul. Alice Rix seemed never to forget and never to neglect anything. New claims and new possibilities of kindness seemed to enter her life without displacing anything that was already there; she had the genius of order that makes the full life of its privileged possession more leisurely and reposeful than the empty one of another. Everything she undertook went smoothly. She seemed to get everything on which she was bent accomplished, and yet you would not say that she had a commanding personality, but rather, as a friend put it, a permeating one. Alas! that the strain of a series of trials, any one of which would seem enough to have broken a less vivid power of life, should at last, in the closing months, have tamed even her indomitable power, and brought her a few weeks before her husband to a too early grave. No one will forget the zest with which she entered into the discussions which made her husband's study a laboratory of the truly "higher" thought. When her face was in repose she might have sat for the Mary or Rachel which the mediæval imagination symbolised as the contemplative life. She did not often take direct part in the discussions, and yet her presence was a part of them, and from time to time a smile would play over her face as if suggested by some inward reserve of her instinctive insight as she followed every turn of the argument, and saw more clearly than the disputants themselves how it bore upon some fact of spiritual or practical life that was, to her at least, outside the potency of ratiocination to lift up or to cast down. For all her devotion and unlimited powers of admiration and loyalty, she had her own inviolable reserves and she was mistress of her own soul.

By their neighbours Herbert and Alice Rix were well nigh worshipped. Children were devoted to them; but not children only. There was no trouble which they did not seem able to lighten, no perplexity or difficulty which they could not help to remove, no public or private possibilities of an enlarged or more gracious life which they were not daily engaged in opening with balanced and inventive wisdom.

Ovid tells how Jupiter and Mercury, when turned back from the doors of the great and wealthy, found hospitality in the cottage of Baucis and Philemon, and when a vengeful flood overwhelmed the ungodly palaces, the cottage of the peasant and his wife, lifted safe above the destructive waves, was changed into a temple. The deities asked them to name their wish, for it should be fulfilled; and they asked leave to be priest and priestess in the cottage-temple, and added the prayer that they might die on the same day. Headland Cottage was indeed a temple, and if the priest and priestess did not die on the same day, yet few can hope for so near an accomplishment of that prayer. In death they were not long divided.

LECTURES ON IMMORTALITY.

We noticed at Easter last year's Ingersoll Lecture by Dr. Crothers on "The Endless Life," in the American edition, and are very glad to add a further word of cordial welcome to the English edition, published by Messrs. Constable & Co., and to note a re-issue of the earlier lectures on the same foundation in a uniform 16mo. edition, daintily bound in cloth (1s. net each). Professor William James's lecture of 1898, on "Human Immortality: Two supposed objections to the Doctrine," is already in the sixth edition; and there is also Professor Royce's lecture on "The Conception of Immortality," and Professor W. Osler's on "Science and Immortality." Another booklet by Professor Münsterberg, of Harvard, on "The Eternal Life," is included by Messrs. Constable in the same series.

Note especially what Dr. Crothers says towards the end of his lecture on the wholeness of life and the friendliness of the universe. He cites the example of Mr. Honest in "Pilgrim's Progress" as full of encouragement.

"There is a faith in immortal life which has characterised visionaries. There is an ecstatic confidence of those whose souls have been filled with a sudden glory. But more convincing to most of us is the sober confidence of the simple man who stands in his integrity undaunted by death: He sees no miraculous visions, but he is steadied by his experience, and he takes for granted that he is going on. Such a wholesome spirit appeals alike to the Stoic and to the Christian."

IN all true works of Art wilt thou discern Eternity looking through Time; the God-like rendered visible.—Carlyle.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE example of a generous courage, of which I told you last week, showed a man who in the moment of mortal danger thought first not of himself, but of the little lad who was his companion. Another example of steadfast courage did not ed so happily, but it is none the less noble on that account. It was the heroism of a large number of soldiers, who at the word of command stood quietly in their ranks, ready to die rather than endanger the lives of others, when their ship was going down.

It was on the troop-ship Birkenhead, which struck a sunken rock near Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope, on February 25, 1852. It was a quiet night, and the sea was perfectly calm, but it was swarming with sharks, and more than four hundred men went down with the ship.

A poem by Sir Francis Doyle tells of this. He supposes one of the soldiers, who was saved, to be speaking:—

"Right on our flank the crimson sun went down;

The deep sea roll'd around in dark repose;

When, like the wild shriek from some captured town,

A cry of women rose.

"The stout ship Birkenhead lay hard and fast,

Caught without hope upon a hidden rock;
Her timbers thrill'd as nerves, when through them pass'd

The spirit of that shock."

There were women and children on board as well as the troops, and everything was done to save them in the boats. In the confusion and terror of such a moment it would not have been wonderful if some of the men had joined in a wild rush for the boats, which would have swamped them, and all might have been lost. But perfect order was maintained. At their Colonel's word of command, the men formed in their ranks on the deck, and though someone cried, "All to the boats!" they knew their duty, and stood firm.

"Our English hearts beat true—we would not stir;

That base appeal we heard, but heeded not.

On land, on sea, we had our Colours, sir,
To keep without a spot!

"They shall not say in England that we fought

With shameful strength unhonour'd life to seek;

Into mean safety, mean deserters brought
By trampling down the weak.

"So we made women with their children go,

The oars ply back again, and yet again;
Whilst, inch by inch, the drowning ship sank low,

Still under steadfast men.

"What follows, why recall? The brave who died,

Died without flinching in the bloody surt.
They sleep as well beneath that purple tide

As others under turf."

The surf was bloody when the ship went down because the dreadful sharks were there; but the men died fearlessly. They had given their lives that the others might be saved.

DR. CARPENTER'S ADDRESS.

THE new session at Manchester College, Oxford, opened on Monday, when the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, as Principal, delivered the public address, in the presence of a goodly number of friends and supporters of the College, in addition to the students.

The subject of the address was "Christianity in the Light of Religious Experience," and it follows as a natural companion to the address of last year on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science." We are glad to be allowed to publish it in these columns, but owing to the length of the address can only give the first half this week. The rest will follow next week, and meanwhile the whole course of the address may be gathered from the brief synopsis added here.

Dr. CARPENTER, in taking up his new task as Principal of the College, does but enter with fuller opportunity upon the work to which his life for many years has been devoted, and in this opening address there is once more the appeal for strenuous service and for trust in the supreme realities of the spiritual life, which we have long been accustomed to associate with his influence as teacher and friend. This is the true appeal for men who are preparing for the ministry of religion, and those who are already in the field, no less than the students of the College, will be the better for pondering his words.

A genuine ministry, we are bidden to remember, can arise only out of a life quickened with the awe and love of God, and they who are called to service in these latter days may seek their commission only in the inward witness of the Spirit, confident in the Divine appeal of truth and righteousness, leading ever to more perfect vision of the kingdom of God. From the long experience of history, and above all from the supreme religious lives of the world, instruction, guidance, and inspiration are to be sought; but only as they serve to illumine and deepen the personal experience of each one in his own life with God, and help to confirm the individual purpose of consecration, self-surrender, and devoted service.

The following headings will show the chief contents of Dr. CARPENTER'S address:—

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CHRISTIANITY IN THE LIGHT OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.*

OPENING ADDRESS BY THE PRINCIPAL, THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.LITT.

THE College which calls us together again to-day exists to "promote the study of religion, theology, and philosophy, without insisting on the adoption of particular doctrines." This study is organised for the most part with a special object, and it is pursued under special conditions. That object is the preparation for the ministry of religion; and the chief of those conditions is freedom from dogmatic control. On the importance of this condition I need not dwell. It is the heritage of more than two centuries of faith and prayer, and we are bound to hand it on unimpaired to the generations to come. At the gate of the oldest of British universities we are its solitary and inconspicuous champions. But the silent homage to it spreads from year to year and land to land, and it is not the property of any sect, or associated exclusively with any type of theological belief. Only recently one of the most renowned divinity schools in America discovered that the Westminster Confession, which had hitherto served as its standard of doctrine, was no part of its legal foundation. It was promptly eliminated, and the great Union Seminary of New York, which counts nearly two-hundred students on its roll, became by constitution as free as ourselves. No longer need I vindicate the spiritual significance of this principle for the student of religion. That has been done on important occasions in our recent history with unsurpassed clearness and fervour by the beloved and revered teacher in whose place I speak to you to-day, and his expositions of its meaning and scope, together with those more widely known writings which have placed him in the front rank of modern English theologians, I commend to your earnest attention. Let me only remind you that it lays on all who come within its range, to teach or learn, austere demands—a love of truth which can overcome all prejudices, courage to face all difficulties without fear, sincerity and simplicity of purpose, patience of heart for tireless labour and unflinching trust.

I.

From the condition I turn to the purpose of your study. You seek to serve your fellow men through the ministry of religion. It matters not whether that ministry be exercised within our four seas or in the Far East; the spiritual needs of man do not differ in England, India, or Japan. The intellectual outlook may indeed vary; the moral tradition, the social organisation, may change. But the fundamental elements of life, the constitution of our moral nature, do not depend on climate, race, or language;

* An Address delivered at the opening of the Session, on Monday, October 15. Dr. Carpenter's Address at the opening of the previous Session, on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science," appeared in the INQUIRER of October 21, 1905, and has also been separately published by the College. The present Address is also to be so published immediately.

Man thinks, feels, hopes, loves, wills, on every continent, from zone to zone all round the earth, and though the interpretations of his experience may differ, its essential factors still remain the same. Beneath his feet the same earth bears him up, over his head arches the same sky, the visible symbols to ancient imagination of the Parental Powers which produce and sustain him. Everywhere man is born and dies, everywhere he toils and struggles, everywhere he rises and falls, everywhere he blunders and succeeds, everywhere he suffers and aspires, everywhere he sorrows and rejoices; and the mighty sum of energies and desires, of frustrated effort, of achieved progress, of baffled endeavour, of triumphant advance—the victories of the strong, the humiliations of the weak, the oppressions of the cruel, the patience of the lowly, the oppositions of falsehood and truth, of self-aggrandisement and self-renunciation—make up the vast and bewildering scene of our existence. Through these confusions you seek to find a way that you may become guides to other men. Into the gloom you would bring a light from heaven that your brothers here and there may cease from fighting shadows, and may be at rest. Above the discords you would sound the call to courage, steadfastness, and joy, as those who would say “Be of good cheer, we are not alone, the Father is with us, we can do all things through him who strengthens us.” This is the note of religion. It will often be your business to impart knowledge, but you will not stir the hearts of men by instruction alone; the ministry of religion will call upon you to be something more than teachers. You may often resort for special purposes to the Press, and through the columns of the newspaper you may address scores or hundreds for every one that listens to your spoken word; but the preacher must openly declare what the journalist will veil in secrecy and reserve. You will again and again advocate social causes, and temperance and purity, civic betterment and international peace, will enlist your labour; but your work will not be accomplished solely by social reform, do not mistake the part for the whole, or the means for the end. Behind, above, around, within all human things is God; and the test of your ministry will lie in your power to make this tremendous and perpetual fact the source of help and gladness to all within your reach. When the young Aberdeen professor, Henry Scougall (in 1677), described religion as the “life of God in the soul of man,” he summed up in a pregnant phrase a truth which the seers of all ages hold in common. That this life varies in intensity, clearness, purity, through the dull and grosser media of our human experience, is the testimony alike of personal consciousness and the whole history of faith. To disengage it from its “muddy vesture of decay,” and recognise it in the spirit of truth and righteousness and love, to interpret its everlasting claims, to glorify duty by its august sanctions, to inspire trust in its infinite purposes, to create confidence in its continuous support, this is the task of the ministry of religion. I welcome you to the preparation for it with sympathy; we are to walk together along common paths. To-day I offer you some counsels as an elder comrade on the way, concerning the relation of your studies here to your future work.

II.

The method of your preparation for this work must be chiefly determined by your conception of that work itself. Have you come hither as to a lawyer's office or a hospital, to learn the secrets of an honourable craft, or qualify yourselves for a respectable profession? Have you chosen this, not, indeed, as a path to affluence, but as containing at least the promise of a livelihood with the minimum of effort or competitive endeavour? Are your tastes literary, and do you prefer the student's desk to the banker's counter or the humbler lines of trade? Or are you here to be confirmed in your own opinions and trained as the agent of a party or a sect? Were these, indeed, the motives of your enrolment in our little band, I would bid you recognise at once that you have gravely misconceived the purpose of this College, and I would urge you to withdraw while there is yet time from a vocation to which you have not been called. But if you have been quickened with the awe and love of God, if the vision of his kingdom has arisen, however dimly, before your eyes, if you have felt that life holds no better thing for you than to be (however feebly) the messenger of his truth and righteousness, then remember the nature of the function you assume, and humbly pray for strength to fulfil it. No church, no teacher, no institution, can accredit you. We can transmit to you no commission, confer on you no power, which is not yours already by natural endowment or the grace of God, nor can we place in your hands a book of infallible oracles for you to expound, so that your work shall be done when you have imparted a knowledge of the saving word. Revelation can no longer be interpreted as the inerrant communication of supernatural truth. The great theological change of the last century in which this college bore its share through the wide learning and the spiritual serenity of John James Tayler, and the philosophical genius and splendid literary power of James Martineau, has cast a wholly new light on the nature and sources of religion, and by inevitable consequence on the work of the ministry. Looking back at fourscore years and ten over the inner meaning of his long labours, Dr. Martineau thus defined their significance:—“The substitution of religion at first-hand, straight out of the immediate interaction between the soul and God, for religion at second-hand, fetched by copying out of anonymous traditions of the Eastern Mediterranean eighteen centuries ago, has been the really directing, though hardly conscious, aim of my responsible years of life.” It is upon this foundation that your work now stands, “Religion at first hand, straight out of the immediate interaction between the soul and God.” The power of your service will depend on your ability—first of all to realise, and secondly to interpret and express this solemn truth. You cannot confront it with a light heart. You aspire to be the servants of the Most High; and no college training can command the gifts of the Spirit which will set fit thoughts in your mind, or adequate words upon your tongue. Does the discipline of the class-room, then, count for nothing? If the conception of the ministry in its highest form is that of prophecy, are you thereby exempted from all personal labour, and discharged from the student's tasks? By no means. The spirit indeed bloweth where it listeth, nor is it ours to tell why the divine fire is kindled in one heart while a brother's still remains unmoved. But if we know not the original conditions of God's gifts, we do know something of the means by which they may be quickened and confirmed. A gift that is not cherished will lose alike its value and its force; and a gift of which you can render no account, which you cannot fit in with other parts of your experience, and justify intelligibly at least to some around you, will cease to have meaning either for you or them, it will fade away, and disappear, and leave you lamenting the illusions of a dream.

What safeguards can we offer you against this dissipation of your first fervours, what helps will foster and expand your seed of life? In the first place, it is the business of philosophy to set forth clearly and explicitly that which dwells obscurely and confusedly within your mind. It seeks to make intelligible to you the august relationship of God and man of which you are already dimly conscious. It aims to provide you, not indeed with a solution of all mysteries, but with such a reasoned interpretation of your being and the world in which you live, as shall give firmness and consistency to your thought, and enable you to confront without fear the spirit of denial. “Rationalism,” says its latest historian, Mr. A. W. Benn, “is the habit of using reason for the destruction of religious belief.” I will subscribe to no such limitation. I am not concerned with the propriety of the use of a word. The writer who thus defines his meaning is entitled to intellectual respect if he is consistent in its application. But he is at least open to the reply that reason has a wider scope and nature than the reasoning which he employs for this end. Reason may indeed undo ecclesiastical formulæ, and compel us in due course to rewrite the creeds. It may call again and again for the reinterpretation of our experience, and in the process it may profoundly modify the experience itself. But it cannot eliminate itself from the world, for it is only because the mind of man and the universe around him are related, that any science is possible at all; and religion, therefore, which seeks for the unity and meaning of life in the vast order of the whole, can never be anything but rational. To the study of philosophy, therefore, I commend you as the intellectual foundation of your teaching. Be not afraid of the labours she imposes. She is an exacting mistress, but in the pursuit of her is a high reward. She opens to you the fellowship of truth, and to bear witness to the truth, as the author of the Fourth Gospel taught us long ago, it is well worth while to be born, to live, and die.

III.

But there is a second aid to the student of the ministry which possesses a greater power and more penetrating force. The spirit which has discerned visions of beauty must learn to translate them into noble form by familiarity with the works of the great artists; he can obtain no mastery of line or colour without method. The musician must understand the laws of sound, he must comprehend the modes in which the creators of melody and harmony have employed their themes and combined their instruments, as the expression of the spiritual passions of hope and joy, of sorrow or peace. And in like manner he who would portray the unseen realities of beauty and good, he who would draw from the thousand strings of the harp of life the deathless music of aspiration and comfort, must have learned to behold the prophet's vision, and hear the song of gladness to which the walls of the city of God are for ever rising in our midst. The world at large does not live by philosophy, but by the devout experience of men and women. The ministry of counsel and rebuke, of courage for the struggling, of rest for the storm-tossed, requires that we should understand the heart-secrets of others and know how the leaders of the faith have learned to suffer and be strong. For this purpose the records of the religious life lie open to you. They are not always easy reading. They are often entangled in beliefs which we have discarded, and embodied in forms which appeal to us no more. It will be your task to distinguish between the passing and the permanent elements of religion, and learn how to shape them anew so as to make them potent for the needs of to-day. To this end you must follow them to their sources, and realise their intensest and most vital forms. For the Christian, the great book of religion is the Bible, and the historic origin of his faith lies in the life and teaching of Jesus. But the study of the New Testament has entered in our time on to new paths, the end of which it is impossible to foresee. The theologians, even of my boyhood, believed that its various authors spoke with one voice of revealed and revealing truth. The nature of Jesus, for example, was matter of historic fact; historic fact could happen in but one way, and the testimony of its witnesses must be uniform from end to end. The Christian life which was founded on the gospel, was equally simple. The precepts of Jesus were the sole and sufficient guide; and the language of devotion amongst us two generations back could find no meaning in the words that were dear to the heart of Evangelical piety. When Dr. Martineau, just half a century ago, preached a famous sermon at Norwich entitled "One Gospel in many Dialects," the criticism which it provoked disclosed how much his contemporaries had yet to learn. For he pleaded that the truths of Christianity, alighting upon different minds, spontaneously assumed different forms as they were interpreted by varying types of experience. To one the Gospel presented itself as a new Law, and Jesus sat upon the Mount to replace the commandments of Moses with fresh legislation from on high. The appeal of Christ was thus addressed predominantly to our wills, "This do, and thou shalt live." To faithfulness of service was attached the promise of appropriate reward, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." What, then, of the reluctant spirit that struggled to obey the Law and failed, or even that faithfully discharged the Law and found it wanting?

What of the conscience that punctually rendered its legal dues, yet, when all was done that Law required, was still torn with unsatisfied endeavour? What of the aspiring soul that found no peace in the familiar round, and craved a new object of affection that might raise it out of death, and with fresh devotion quench all vain desire? Before the spirit that feels itself enslaved to sin beneath the law there rises an image of self-sacrificing love, which wakens faith and fills the whole being with new life. What was out of reach to the bondman under rule, immediately becomes possible to the freedom of sonship. The Christianity of the Apostle Paul, reproduced along the lines of Christian history in an Augustine, a Luther, or a Bunyan, presents us with a type of passionate natures which long for something beyond mere ethical control. When the demands of affection are unsatisfied with the moral pieties, they can rest content with nothing short of mystic identification with the power that has lifted them above themselves. It is of the nature of this vehement and tumultuous life that it should express itself through crises of struggle and of peace; that the past should appear enveloped in the shadow of sin, which dissolves by the experience of a moment into a glow of joy. To others, however, it is impossible thus to divide the years either of personal life or of human history into periods of dramatic progress marked by catastrophes of fall and redemption, of resurrection and judgment. The world is already the scene of the divine thought, present since the beginning when the heavenly reason, issuing from the timeless depths of the infinite life, became articulate in the universe we know, and bound together its remotest parts in one intelligible sphere of light and love. Nor could humanity have been overlooked by its illuminating activity. The divine Word must have lighted everyone, and the long story of the race was the continuous self-revelation of the Eternal. Man dwells already, therefore, in two worlds, though the veil of blindness that lies upon his eyes often hides from him the meaning of his heavenly kinship. Only let the healing touch descend, and he discerns that the immensities around him are filled with the heavenly Presence, and he himself can feel and think, can love and pray, only because he dwells in God, and God in him. In such high fellowship the barriers of sense are done away. The vision of the everlasting life is independent of the accident of death. In knowledge rather than in obedient self-mastery or loving self-surrender is the secret of eternal life. God is spirit, and the hour of his true worship has arrived for evermore.

IV.

In some such mode as this could our great philosophic theologian vindicate the diversities of type which the New Testament presents, and declare that we may thereby not only justify the divisions of Christendom, but even cease to wish that they should disappear. The development of New Testament theology during the last fifty years has added many a detail to the picture which he sketched, but the persistent and relentless search for historic truth has somewhat altered our point of view, as is indeed exemplified in Dr. Martineau's own latest work, The Seat of Authority in Religion. On the one hand enlarged knowledge of the apocalyptic literature before and after the actual years of Jesus has disclosed the sources of much of the doctrine of the New Testament concerned with the person of the Messiah and the expectation of the judgment and the end of the age. And on the other hand a deeper insight into the forms of religious belief by which the early church was surrounded, has brought to light the remarkable circumstance that some of what were formerly supposed to be its most peculiar ideas and distinctive experiences, were after all shared by other religions and realised under other sacred names. I have already in an address last year invited your attention to some illustrations of these facts. Let me pass on to another consideration suggested by recent study of the psychology of religion, viz., the connection between doctrines and experience.

The first great constructor of Christian doctrine is the Apostle Paul. The exigencies of his mission required him to frame a defence of Christianity against both Jew and Gentile. It was he, accordingly, who laid down the main lines of the great interpretation, which the Fourth Evangelist, writing at a later date, could translate into other moulds more closely akin to Hellenic thought. The student of those wonderful letters which are the first records of Christian endeavour, is confronted with an impassioned type of religious life wholly different from that presented in the First Three Gospels by Jesus himself. The apostle moves off the field of history into an upper world of speculative interpretation, where we stand face to face with a contrast which may be best expressed in the words of the distinguished Principal of Mansfield College:—

"As a teacher there are many men in many lands and times with whom He (Jesus) may be compared; but as a creative and sovereign personality there are in the whole of history only two or three—if, indeed, there are so many—with any claim to stand by His side. As a teacher he is a natural person, with historical antecedents, a social environment, a religious ancestry, and a position honourable, but not unique, amid the great masters of mind; but as a sovereign personality He is a new Being, without father, or mother, or genealogy, separate, supreme, creating by His very appearing a new spiritual type or order. As a Teacher we can easily conceive Him as a Jew and a peasant, the lineal descendant of the prophets, and near of kin to the rabbis of Israel; but there is no harder intellectual task than to relate the sovereign personality to the Jewish peasant, his antecedents and environment."

This higher personality first appears in the writings of Paul. He wears a radiant form of glory from which all elements of race, language, nationality, have dropped away; in which, moreover, he is identified with the Spirit, and becomes the source of all the graces and gifts that pervade the Church. His earthly career (if I understand the apostle aright—I know how I differ from the profoundest of our living students) was only a brief episode between two ages of heavenly glory, one in which he had already in some sense dwelt with God before the world and served as the divine instrument in creation, the other in which, in virtue of his obedience to the cross, he had been raised to the dignity of Lord at God's right hand. There he was endowed with sovereignty over the occupants of the heavenly spheres; there he should triumph over the forces of evil; there he should reign till the final hour when he destroyed at last the enmity of death. Then, when the resurrection and judgment were completed, he should resign his delegated power, return to subjection beneath him who had invested him with temporary authority, that, in the timeless immensity of being, God might be all in all. Into this cosmic framework the apostle fits his great doctrines of the destinies of Israel, the significance of the Law, the conflicts of sin and righteousness, the meaning of Christ's redemptive death, the gifts of the Spirit, the organic unity of the Church, the mystic identification of the believer with his heavenly Lord. And the root of the whole lies, as all serious interpreters are now agreed, in that great moment when (to use Paul's own phrase) it was the good pleasure of God to reveal his Son in him. That mighty change produced an experience so intense that the apostle could only compare it to death, burial, and resurrection. He, too, has been crucified. The old man lies in the grave; he feels himself new made; he has already risen and sits in heavenly places; he, too, is on the way to a share in the great consummation. To meet his Lord he will be caught up into the air, and he looks forward to judging angels. To explain this change, to account for corresponding changes in those to whom he writes, to set the new life of which he is the herald in the purposes of God for Israel on the one hand and the Gentiles on the other, to find a place for Christ in the mysteries of the Father's providential guidance of the world, he uses the scriptures of his people, the phases of contemporary belief, the theology of the Pharisees, the hopes of apocalyptic visionaries, and reasonings of his own, all fused together in one glow of impassioned trust. Powers and processes, the physical and the spiritual, moral energies emerging anon into personality and then dropping back into impersonal indefiniteness, a world-system conceived on a scale which our astronomy has long since broken up, a time-scheme which history has completely outgrown, blend in the pages of these letters which can never cease to be the inspiration of the missionary, the support of the champion of liberty, the call to personal effort, the consolation of those who have shuddered at unsuspected depths of evil in their own hearts and have sought refuge from their weakness in a higher strength, the joy of those who have humbly learned to walk in the spirit.

Through this bewildering mixture of the real and the unreal the minister of religion who makes the New Testament his chief book of devotion must learn to find his way. And he cannot escape the question, how far is the experience of the believer in the twentieth century bound to conform to that of the apostle in the first? If he inquires of either of the two great creations of modern English religion which, without any tradition or national resources at their back, have thrown their arms all round the world—the Methodism of the eighteenth century or the Salvation Army of to-day, the answer is decisive: There is no access to God but through conversion and the redeeming blood of Christ. The student of Christian history, however, is soon aware that Christian experience assumes many forms, and is mediated by very different agencies. Even within the New Testament itself, how striking is the contrast between the letters of Paul and the apostolic sermons in the Book of Acts. Gaze with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews into the heavenly sanctuary where the great high priest who was himself the victim of his sacrifice is seated at the right hand of the throne; pierce through the blinding glare of apocalyptic splendours to the rider on the white horse with a sharp sword in his mouth wherewith to smite the nations; read the sober exhortations of James; examine the forms of post-apostolic thought in Clement, Barnabas, the Teaching of the Twelve, Hermas's Shepherd, the writings of Justin the Martyr, you will find Christianity presented as an ethical life, a new philosophy, a moral not a ceremonial law, but the distinctive features of the Pauline teaching reappear only in the Fourth Gospel and Ignatius, and some of its most characteristic elements have been already dropped upon the way. The type which is held up to us as the rule and norm of our spiritual life, falls into the background of early Christian thought. It was the doctrine of the Word which supplied the basis for the great dogmatic constructions of the Church. It might be too much to say that one half of the apostle to the Gentiles was unintelligible because he was a Jew, and the other half was incomprehensible because he was Paul. A spirit of such rare individuality could work wonders on the souls he personally awakened. But when the magic of his presence was withdrawn, the specific character of his experience failed to reproduce itself, and the Christian organisation of teaching and of life was developed along other lines.

(To be concluded.)

The lectures for the first term of the new session include courses by the Principal on "The Person and Work of Jesus Christ in the Pauline and Johannine Writings"; "The Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ according to the First Three Gospels"; and "Ideas of the Life after Death, Resurrection, and Judgment, in Israel, from the Captivity to the Fall of Jerusalem."

Mr. Addis is lecturing on "History of the Religion of Israel—Pre-Prophetic Religion," and on "The Theology of the Psalms."

Mr. Jacks has a course on "Philosophy of Religion: Problems of the Religious Consciousness"; and Emeritus Professor Upton on "Idealist Ethics."

The Dunkin lecturer this term is Mr. Charles Douglas, D.Sc., who begins on November 20 a course on "The Unemployed, the Unemployable, and the State."

All these lectures are open to members of the University.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE autumn meeting was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, but probably through lack of proper announcement was not so well attended as usual.

The members and friends were received by the President, Mr. John Harrison, and during the usual pleasant social time before the chair was taken Miss Agnes Oakshott kindly sang some songs.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, spoke earnestly of the need for more zeal in denominational work. However much there might be of growth of liberalism in other churches, we still had our own work to do, and the Unitarian trumpet ought to give no uncertain sound. That Society was not unmindful of its duty to London.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER, who was the first speaker, said that Unitarians often tended to become too individualistic. To many a born Unitarian the ideal seemed to be a church of units. There ought to be more mutual concern and sense of comradeship among their members. No one could be sincerely religious who was selfish in his religious worship. They must desire to spread abroad the knowledge of their faith, and secure a greater efficiency in the apparatus at their disposal. They must recognise that they had a cause to work for, and put that first. They needed better organisation. In London, if the field was too great for close fellowship, they should form smaller groups of churches. He thought also that their union should be representative of the churches, and not a society of individuals. The former would have more weight with other churches, and he told how much had been done by the Manchester District Association, to promote fellowship and further the good work. The churches needed encouragement, direction, and practical help, and this could best be given by a central body representative of the churches.

The Rev. Dr. CROTHERS spoke first of his experiences in England and then of Unitarianism in America. His impression of Unitarianism in England, he said, after being here for six months and going about a good deal, was very different from that which he first got from listening to some of their ministers talking about it. There was more strength, and courage, and achievement, and he was delighted to have had that last month of activity, going about among the churches. He had found an enthusiasm and heartiness up in Lancashire, which reminded him of their own West. The quality of thinking well of themselves, and having very great reason for it, was something he sympathised with. The two movements of Unitarianism in America and in this country were substantially the same in their history and general bearing on the national life, and the great advantage of comparison was that there was hardly a discouragement in one place which could not be balanced by encouragement in another. People were too apt to generalise from a small number of circumstances and local peculiarities and difficulties, and conclude they were necessary in the movement as a whole. But the fact was that you could do almost anything very well somewhere; the difficulties, were not in the cause, but were only local. When people asked whether the work of the minister was harder in America or England, he replied that there were differences. Some things were harder in America, some in England. They had not in America the splendid Sunday Schools working among poor children, nor had they the institution of lay-preachers, about which they talked as something Utopian. On the other hand, Unitarianism in America had a great advantage in its history, in having been associated with the University movement, first at Harvard, and with the literary development around Boston. That gave it the opportunity of getting the youth of the nation. One of the most interesting characteristics of the work of their Association was in connection with the College towns. They could hardly exaggerate the influence of their free University system throughout the States; and to each of the University cities they had sent as strong a man as they could to take charge of the local church. Thus Mr. Sunderland had formerly been at Ann Arbor, where the University of the State of Michigan was; and in other similar cases the churches had been specially fostered by the Association, both in the central States and in California. That work had been splendidly encouraging; their Unitarian ministers had, if anything, an advantage over all others in getting a hearing from the students. It was a help to them that the country as a whole was a new country, and the people were accustomed to take up with new ideas, and to carry them out. They found that in any town of 10,000 inhabitants, if they sent a competent minister, they could start a Unitarian Church, though it must be confessed that it was not always so easy to carry it on.

What he felt that they needed in the churches was more of the missionary spirit and motive. He was constantly thankful that the first year of his ministry had been as a Presbyterian missionary, not to a church, but for the starting of churches in the Far West. And when he came back he determined that he would not fall into the idea that he was coming back to an old movement. There was no such thing as an old religious movement. It might, indeed, have its roots in the past, but its enthusiasm came from the present opportunity. It was the new interest, the new people that mattered most. In preaching it was not the old members for whom he cared most; their ways of thinking were probably settled; but if someone came in, who had not been there before, that was the person he was interested in—the new person, the stranger seeking for something new. The churches that grew, made their own opportunity, feeling they had a mission to others, and then the others came. A young lady from Canada, who had been about here, but not in Lancashire, where he had been, had said that what impressed her was that Unitarianism was not preached here as if it were the latest thing out. But that was what they must make it—the latest and the best thing out. The opportunity had been won for them by their fathers. There was no reason why they should not go to the world with their Unitarian religion as members who confidently and consciously were in the very vanguard of the Church Universal. They had something to say, and people were waiting and eager to hear just the thing which they at their best could give. The people did not care much for their second best. The matter of numbers would take care of itself. They ought not to be afraid of small numbers, but ought not to be satisfied with them. They were a nucleus for the great church for which they were planning and to which they belonged.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE congratulated the meeting on having heard an address so inspiring and instructive from Dr. Crothers; and then told of a letter he had just received from Dr. Tudor Jones telling of the great success and encouragement of the work at Wellington, New Zealand.

Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR said that, though their churches were the freest and most democratic in their constitution, in no others was the general body of members less self-reliant, less impressed with the responsibility of the individual for the welfare of the church. He wanted to abolish the layman, the lay-figure, the lay spirit from their churches, and make all feel that they were ministers, and each one had a service to render. They ought to organise more propagandist work, and he thought the district society should appeal to the young men of the Laymen's Club to come out to help.

Dr. CROTHERS added a word as to the international meetings to be held in Boston next year, appealing for a large delegation to come over; for that meeting, he was sure, could be made very helpful to their churches in both countries. He earnestly commended the movement for sending over a large delegation, and hoped that the Association would send on some of their number to Canada, too, to see something of the great North West, where the people were waiting for the very best they could give them.

The Rev. W. C. PORE moved and Mr. PERCY PRESTON seconded a vote of thanks to Dr. Crothers and the other speakers, and a vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. HAROLD WADE and seconded by Mr. A. A. TAYLER, brought the meeting to a close.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

ON Sunday, October 14, the anniversary sermons of the association were preached in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, by the Rev. Dendy Agate, of Altrincham.

The annual business meeting was held on Monday afternoon. The chair was occupied by the President, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, and there were present friends from Newcastle, Gateshead, South Shields, Sunderland, Middlesbrough, Darlington, Barnard Castle, Choppington, and Byker.

The minutes of the last annual meeting were read by the secretary, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, and confirmed.

The secretary then presented the committee's annual report, which, together with the financial statement submitted by the financial secretary, Mr. W. F. Maitland was, on the motion of the chairman, seconded by Mr. V. Errington, formally adopted.

The Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, was unanimously re-elected president of the association for the ensuing year, as were also Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, secretary; Capt. W. Lowrie, of Newcastle, treasurer; and Mr. W. F. Maitland, of Newcastle, financial secretary.

Miss Lucas, of Darlington, then moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting approves of the objects of the Union for social service, and hereby recommends the formation of branches amongst the various churches affiliated with this association."

This was seconded by Mrs. Blues, of South Shields, and, after some discussion, unanimously adopted.

The Rev. S. S. Brettell, lately appointed minister at Darlington, read a paper on "The Function of a Free Church," which was followed by a most interesting and animated discussion, among those taking part being the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. G. Pearton, and G. A. Ferguson, Mrs. Armitage Smith, and Miss Lucas.

At half-past five there was the usual public tea in the schoolroom, kindly provided by the ladies of the Dorcas Society; and in the evening a public meeting in the church, when addresses were given by the President, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, in the chair; the Lord Mayor of Newcastle, Sir Joseph Banks Ellis, J.P., who moved the vote of thanks to the special preacher, the Revs. Dendy Agate, Frank Walters, S. S. Brettell, A. G. Pearton, and G. A. Ferguson.

The usual votes of thanks concluded the proceedings.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

MANCHESTER is in a militant mood just now, and its streets echo to the blare of bugle and the marching of men. Twenty thousand men and boys marched to Belle Vue a fortnight ago, not, as the Bishop declared, to see the elephants or the fireworks, but to denounce the iniquities of the present Government. It was an imposing demonstration, and, for my part, I was more inclined to weep than to scoff as the great throng moved on to the strains of "Onward, Christian Soldiers." "We are not divided" sang the processionists: Would it were so, but alas! we are. Last Saturday the Roman Catholics foregathered—forty thousand strong—at the same place. Their denunciation of the Education Bill was equally emphatic. Meanwhile the Northern Counties Education League is organising a big meeting in Manchester to proclaim secular education as the only solution.

This is the outward setting of conflict and confusion amid which we pursue our work here, not, indeed, without ourselves being caught up sometimes in the storm and strife. It is good, however, to reflect that as churches we are not involved in these conflicts.

We have no vested interests in sectarian education to defend; so, while we take our part as individual citizens, as congregations we keep on the inner lines of spiritual religion.

In the old days the summer was one long vacation, except for the regular Sunday services. It is so no longer. We now find in a change of employment a higher form of rest. So before referring to other matters a word must be given to the season just over. And, as being the older of our summer interests, let me report first on the Holiday Home. This beneficent piece of pioneer work, in which our Manchester Sunday School Association is engaged is carried on with as much enthusiasm and success as ever. Through all the glorious summer Great Hucklow has been alive with crowds of merry youngsters from the schools of the district. Some eleven hundred of our scholars, two-thirds of them under sixteen years of age, have enjoyed a week's holiday with their teachers in our beautiful Peakland centre. In addition fifty mothers (most of them with babies) from our Domestic Missions have also had a week there. How much this means in simple joy and improved health it is impossible to say; while the value of the opportunity it affords to teachers of getting to know their scholars better is priceless.

The other summer interest, the "Van," is not a local movement, as the references in your London and Liverpool letter testify. But we shall not willingly let go the claim that the idea was born here, that the van started from here, and now returns here as to its real home; if we hasten also to admit that to London and Liverpool belong all praise for finding the bulk of the money required. The van has been on a voyage of discovery. It has discovered unsuspected powers of eloquent popular extempore speech in many of our ministers, and deep tides of devotion in the hearts of our laymen. That the latter would come out and sing their songs of Zion in the open air was as little suspected a year ago as that our ministers could attract audiences for them to sing to. Why cannot our ministers carry the same free and easy speech into their pulpits? They have had crowds of hearers on village greens and market squares. Surely some, greatly daring, would even venture inside a chapel to hear a rousing sermon; and, who knows, once in they might remain to pray. Anyhow, whatever the effect on preachers and congregations, the van mission has proved that there is a constituency for us in the highways and the hedges if we cannot boast a large one in our places of worship. The Mission will go on. Mr. Spedding talks of four vans next year, and what he talks of has a knack of coming about. I should not be surprised if it should be so in this case. With more vans, more missionaries will be wanted, and perhaps some of them will find in such work their true vocation. Who knows but that by such humble means we are going to get our baptism of fire. Some have found tongues of fire during the past season, and they have preached the Gospel. They will not all go back to merely reading essays, and talking about things! But this subject tempts me beyond the limits of space. Let me only add that Mr. Spedding has done the work of a true leader this past summer, and we are all indebted to him.

And now briefly to more purely local topics. The Rev. H. Dawtrely has come from Sheffield to Broughton. He has had a hearty welcome, and there is before him a fine opportunity. His congregation combines the wisdom of a long experience with the enthusiasm of a new birth. He is, we all believe, the man to realise the fine possibilities of the new situation, and he will be upheld by able and devoted workers in his congregation. The Rev. W. E. George has removed from Swinton to Chorlton, with oversight also of Urmston. This leaves a fine field vacant, for Swinton is one of our most active and living churches, a church which daily proves that working people can find amongst us spiritual sustenance for the hard struggle of daily life. At Chorlton and Urmston the strong personality of Mr. George is sure to make a good impression, and there is the peculiar fitness in his selection that he will carry on at Chorlton the fine traditions of a cultured ministry established by the Revs. D. Agate, W. Burgess, and J. Ruddle, his predecessors there. Unfortunately, we have some other pulpits still vacant. Heaton Moor is looking for the man who can combine high thinking with very plain living; while Oldham Road is just the place for one of the men new born in the Van Mission. If ever there was justification for the Institutional Church, Oldham Road is the place. There are tens of thousands of people within reach of it, and some few score look to it as their light in a hard and difficult world. It ought to be shining out over the weltering mass of struggling pinched manhood, surrounding it as a very beacon of hope and guidance. But where shall we find the man? Such lighthouses we have, thank God, many of them. Only to mention a few, there are the schools in Lower Mosley-street, a marvel of organisation and sustained enthusiasm; the Missions in Embden-street and Willert-street; and the Mission Church at Bradford, all of them doing daily real redemptive Christian work in fields beyond the reach of our ordinary congregations. These prove again that rational religious thought may be so presented as to win and hold the lives of the hardest amongst the toilers of our big cities.

Of the other churches I can only say that some are moving forward, none, I believe, falling back. The air is full of plans of aggressive Christian work. The Social Questions Committee is arranging more lectures; the Temperance Committee is busy organising its next great festival; the Mission Committee is grouping us all out for combined services in our various centres. Everywhere there is life and movement, and while we are not blind to the immense difficulties we have to face, no one dreams of faltering, and no one speaks of despair. On the contrary, we are again challenging fortune in the shape of a great bazaar. Our last great bazaar built us four new churches, beside helping existing ones. Next year we are holding another great bazaar to help sustain our work in the churches, new and old alike. There is urgent need of further funds, but what is more to the point, there is real justification for the appeal in the work which is being done. It is not to initiate problematical new ventures, but to sustain living centres of work that we shall appeal, and I am sure our appeal will not be in vain.

Many other things have accumulated which should be mentioned did space permit. One further word I must be allowed. And it is a sad one. We enter on our winter's work saddened by the loss of a dear comrade. The Rev. H. K. White really belonged to us, although we had lent him to East Cheshire. Alas! he has been called away from us both, and a gap is left in our ranks and our hearts hard to fill. Gifted with a persuasive eloquence in extempore speech and rare elocutionary powers, Mr. White was ever ready to come and help us all in any way and every way possible. We shall long miss his help and cherish his memory.

CHARLES PEACH.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The interest in the opening of the church was fully maintained on Sunday last, when Miss Marian Pritchard conducted the services. The morning was dull and cold, but a large congregation greeted her as speaker. She gave an edifying discourse on "Building our House." In the evening the church was almost full. The subject of her address was "Right in the Sight of God," and it was followed with appreciative attention. Her quiet, sympathetic, and devout manner was exceedingly impressive. The various voices at the opening services were eloquent, and while each had its own special quality, all exemplified a unity of religious faith, and brought home to the hearers a sense of a wide communion of souls.

Bolton: Bank-street.—Dr. Crothers delivered his lecture on "The Making of Religion," on Tuesday, October 9. The rain came down heavily, but about 630 people came to hear it, and listened with close attention throughout. The harvest services were held on Sunday night, and were well attended, the building at night being crowded. The collections amounted to over £36, an increase of £13 on last year.

Boston.—On Sunday evening, October 14, the Rev. W. Stoddart gave a discourse on the subject of the Miracle on the Congo, and described the injustice and cruelty to which the natives were subjected by the Congo State officials, the agents of King Leopold. The Congo State has been converted into a huge plantation for the production of rubber, while the natives, robbed of their property, their rights, and their labour, are compelled to work eleven days out of fourteen, collecting rubber, under a system of taxation, for the enrichment of King Leopold, while they suffer cruelties worse than were ever suffered by the slaves in West-Indian plantations, or in the Southern States of America.

Brighton.—On Wednesday, Oct. 10, the Rev. Priestley Prime gave a lecture on Ruskin, in the Christ Church Hall. The lecture, which was illustrated by lantern slides was much appreciated, and was well reported in last Saturday's Brighton Herald.

Carlisle.—The anniversary services of the Viaduct Church were held on Sunday, when the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, of Sale, preached to augmented congregations. In the evening there was an exceptionally large attendance to hear Mr. Schroeder's discourse on "Authority in Religion." This was the prefatory lecture to a course by the minister, the Rev. A. Thornhill, on the Unitarian faith, and proved a most absorbing subject, Mr. Schroeder holding the interest of his hearers throughout an hour and a quarter's extempore utterance. On Monday evening there was a well-attended tea meeting, the after proceedings being presided over by Mr. Ernest Lowthian. Speeches were made by Mr. Thornhill, who proposed a cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Schroeder, by Mr. Ridley, who seconded the resolution, and by Mr. Schroeder, who responded in his happiest vein. Much enthusiasm was manifested throughout the evening's proceedings which concluded with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," all present joining hands.

Exeter.—The inaugural meeting of the George's Guild for the coming winter session was held on Tuesday evening, October 2, when a representative gathering of about 70 persons were present. Arrangements have been made for a series of addresses on "The Works of Donatello, Andrea del Sarto, and Michel Angelo"; "Some Characters from Plutarch"; "Socialism"; "Notes of Wild Birds"; "Ghosts"; and "Some Reminiscences of Sir John Bowring."

Gateshead.—The committee are anxious for information as to the envelope system of making contributions to the church funds, and the secretary will be greatly obliged if any brother secretary of a church where the system is in use will communicate with him. In connection with the bazaar to be held in the Bewick Hall on Nov. 8 and 9, we have been interested to receive a copy of the booklet "Words of the Wise," tastefully edited by Messrs. Coysh and Donald, a collection of quotations from authors old and new, contributed by a large number of friends in all parts of the country. The demand for this booklet has been such that no copies, we hear, remain on sale. It is a very interesting collection.

Harvest Services.—We have further reports of harvest thanksgiving services at Heaton Moor (Rev. P. M. Higginson, Sept. 30), where on the previous Monday the first wedding in the church was celebrated by the Rev. W. G. Topping; Horsham (Rev. J. J. Marten, Oct. 14; collections for school funds over £4); Nottage (Monday evening, Oct. 15, Revs. D. Rees, W. J. Phillips, and B. C. Davies, of the Baptist Church); Pendleton (Rev. N. Anderton, Oct. 14); South Shields (Rev. R. H. Maister, of Stockton, Oct. 7. Fruit banquet and social on Wednesday, Oct. 10); West Ham Lane (Revs. W. L. Tucker and F. W. Stanley, and Mr. G. Woollard in the afternoon, Oct. 7).

Liscard.—The programme of the twelfth session of the Wednesday Evening Society, which meets in the Memorial Church Hall, opened on Oct. 10, with a lecture by the Rev. J. E. Manning, on "Goethe's Faust." Concerts, at Homes, and evenings for Progressive Whist appear at intervals to relieve the strenuousness of the society's efforts.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday (to-morrow), October 21, the Rev. Dr. Crothers will be in Oxford, and the Rev. L. P. Jacks is to preach at Essex Church, but in the morning only.

Manchester: Bradford.—The October calendar of the Mill street Free Church promises a month of vigorous work. Every evening of the week is occupied. On Tuesdays are the children's happy evenings; on Fridays the men's own meetings. On the first two Sundays of the month, after the usual evening service for the congregation, and the "Young People's Church," held at the same time in the lecture hall, there is an hour's lantern service for adults, from 8 to 9.

Manchester: Cross-street.—On Sunday, October 7, the morning and evening services were conducted by the Revs. James Drummond and S. Alfred Steinthal the communion service being taken by the Rev. E. P. Barrow. The occasion was the Harvest Thanksgiving, and as no service was held at Lower Mosley-street schools, many school friends and former members of the congregation were present; there were about 160 at each service.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—The opening meeting for the new session of the Elder Scholars' Institute was held on Thursday evening, October 11, when a dramatic recital was given by Mr. Fred Duxbury, and was greatly enjoyed by the large audience, numbering about 300.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meeting was held on October 8, at Cefn, the president, Mr. L. N. Williams, of Aberdare, in the chair. Letters were read from Members of Parliament in reply to a resolution of the annual meeting in favour of secular education. Business was dealt with in connection with various congregations, a proposed joint magazine, fellowship meetings, &c. A paper was then read by Mr. R. Evans, of Merthyr, on the work of the Society and the relations of the Society to the constituent churches. This was followed with close interest, and there was a prolonged discussion upon it. In the evening sermons were preached by the Rev. R. J. Jones, in Welsh, and the Rev. G. Critchley, in English.

Treorchy, Rhondda Valley.—A number of young Unitarians and others holding liberal religious views were fortunate, through the active helpfulness of Mr. Spencer Lloyd, in securing the presence of the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Bradford, on Tuesday, October 15, for an afternoon service, held in the Bethania Congregational Chapel, kindly lent for the purpose, and for an evening lecture on "Three Types of Selfishness," at which Dr. A. G. Tribe presided. The sermon was from Matt. ii. 1, "In the days of Herod, Jesus was born," and both this and the lecture were warmly appreciated.

Wareham.—In connection with the quarterly meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association a well-attended public meeting was held at the South-street Chapel on Wednesday, October 10. The chair was taken by the Rev. C. C. Coe, president of the Association, who was supported on the platform by the Mayor of Wareham (Mr. G. Dicker), the Mayor of Poole (Alderman C. Carter, C.C.), Revs. J. Burton and C. E. Reed. The chairman, having described the various views that might be taken of our churches as representing the actual religion of Jesus himself, or providing a religious home, a fellowship of the followers of Christ for those who no longer believe in orthodox creeds, or forming a union not based on theological conceptions, but of free religious fellowship, appealed for mutual toleration and loyal support of the churches, and both of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference, and last, but not least, the newly organised Union of Social Service, to feel the magnitude of the issues at stake, and to give their hearty sympathy and support to those who are trying to solve the problems pressing so urgently on all the churches to-day. Rev. James Burton made a strong appeal to the young to take a more active part in church life and work, as a help in their own life work as well as an aid to the church. The Mayor of Wareham, as a member of the Wesleyan Church, expressed his pleasure at being present, and his good wishes for the Wareham congregation. Rev. C. E. Reed pleaded for more directly denominational teaching in Sunday-schools and churches. Mr. C. Carter (Mayor of Poole) urged that ministers should identify themselves more fully with the social movements of the time. On the proposition of Mr. Wm. Carter, thanks were voted to the Wareham friends, and the meeting was closed by a hymn and the Benediction. Very valued help in the musical arrangements was rendered by members of the Poole choir.

Whitby.—Flowergate Old Chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity on Sunday evening last, and many could not gain admission, when the Rev. F. Haydn Williams gave an account of his experiences in Northallerton prison, for eight days, in August last, for breaking an encroaching fence on the Abbey Plain. He was released on appeal, to be heard at the North Riding Quarter Sessions at Northallerton, on the 19th inst.

STUDIES IN PHILOSOPHICAL CRITICISM AND CONSTRUCTION. 10s. 6d. net. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS.

"This book is the result of much careful thinking. . . . It is well worth reading, because of the thoroughgoing and conscientious manner in which the author defines and faces his problems. . . . His work may be commended to those who are interested in the topics of which it treats."—Mind.

"We know few recent books which promise more, which are written with greater freshness of thought, and which show more speculative acuteness."—The Times.

"We had not read many pages before we found ourselves in the grasp of a master who to original gifts of reflection had added a thorough knowledge of philosophy in its past history and in its present bearings."—The Critical Review.

"We can confidently say that all students who aim at something more than a merely superficial acquaintance with philosophy will find the careful reading of the work most helpful and suggestive."—The Inquirer.

LEADERS OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. 6s. net. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS.

"It is the work of a clear and acute thinker, a man possessed of a wide and deep knowledge of Philosophy, and, above all, a man of high tone and sincere and transparent honesty of purpose."—The Guardian.

"The cardinal merits of his book, and those for which we particularly desire to commend it, are its scholarly and ethical breadth of view, and its freedom from anything like sectarian or partisan animus. It is a book that deals philosophically and logically with the central problem of religious thought, and it may be read with interest and profit by students of any class or persuasion whatever."—The Academy.

"acumen, and with so penetrating an insight into the significance of the ethical and transcendental speculations that have most influence on contemporary thought, that his work could not fail to instruct and stimulate any attentive reader."—The Scotsman.

"Students will find that this series of studies is fresh and independent enough to be worth their attention. . . . Dr. Mellone maintains his right, already vindicated by a previous volume, to a place in the select company of philosophers who ally the power of suggestive exposition to thorough technical equipment."—The Literary World.

AN INTRODUCTORY TEXT BOOK OF LOGIC. Second Edition, Revised. 5s. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS.

"No text-book of Logic that is ever likely to be produced will 'read like a novel'; but so far as it can be simplified, and its difficulties reduced to a minimum, this desirable end has been accomplished in Dr. Mellone's work. To the student it is indispensable, and the maturer scholar will find in it much that is helpful and suggestive."—The Aberdeen Journal.

"In most fields of life. . . . Logic seems so nearly a lost art nowadays, that if only people could be induced to study the elementary principles as expounded in these pages, much good might ensue. . . . For those whose present knowledge of logical principles is vague, and who desire to see more clearly, we cordially commend this book."—The Morning Post.

"Dr. Mellone expounds the subject in a really admirable fashion. . . . The chapters on inductive logic, involving as they do the whole of modern scientific method, are lucid and full of valuable instruction to the most casual reader who has a desire to see for himself how it is possible to find out the truth about natural things."—The Pilot.

"In the hands of Dr. Mellone, Logic is obviously not the mere 'dodge' to which Jowett sought to reduce it, but a subject capable of the most exact scientific treatment. The skill with which the book is so compactly constructed in all its parts shows that the author is a complete master of the subject he comes forward to teach."—The Glasgow Herald.

CONVERGING LINES OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. 2s. net. London: PHILIP GREEN, Essex-street, Strand.

"May be recommended as a popular antidote to much of the materialism now preached as the last word of science upon human affairs."—The Daily News.

"An able and thoughtful consideration of the lines upon which Liberal Orthodoxy and Unitarianism can, and as the author thinks do, approach a common ground."—The Times.

"A series of able and interesting expositions of the main principles on which what we may call the theological reunion of the future will,

as the author thinks, be based. In the present condition of thought it is eminently desirable thus to attempt to discover what are the leading ideas to which most reasonable thinkers will subscribe; and those who read his book will feel that Dr. Mellone is well equipped for this useful task."—The Christian World.

"It bears reading and re-reading, and furnishes a real insight into the inner meaning of a type of religious thought shared by an important school of Unitarians and by liberal minds in other Protestant bodies."—The Christian Life.

This little book has been written in the hope that it will be welcome to young people who ought to know something of James Martineau, whose thinking has had and continues to have a powerful influence upon the best religious life of our time; also to busy people who have not time to read the larger biographies published.

The Christian Register (Boston, U.S.A.) says:—

"The book is designed more especially for the young, yet it is one that the father may read to his children to the improvement of himself, and the minister may ponder to the renewal of his consecration. What a treasure for a young man's birthday!"

In the present age, characterised by conflicting ideas of war and peace; by the glorification of military prowess on the one hand, and by the deepening sense of the value and sacredness of human life on the other—life too often thrown away for ignoble ends—it is well that our attention should be directed to one whose character and career form a standing testimony to the supreme value of noble ideals expressed in the noble acts of a simple, strenuous life.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A FULL report of the autumn meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Leeds and Bradford will be found in our present issue. The Rev. W. Rosling and his congregation are to be congratulated on their new church, provided with such admirable energy and care by the Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. The Conference on missionary work at Leeds affords much matter for thought. The paper read by the Rev. Charles Travers was deserving of special attention.

DR. CROTHERS' Essex Hall Lecture on "The Making of Religion," which he has recently redelivered at Norwich and elsewhere, is published this week, as a little shilling book, tastefully bound (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.), and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has just re-issued his Essay on "The Faith of a Free Church," in a new series of tracts (2d.).

ANOTHER lecture which Dr. Crothers has been giving is on "The Present Crisis of the Christian Church." It was given to an audience of between three and four hundred in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on Thursday of last week, and briefly reported in the Liverpool Daily Post, which, on Saturday last, had a leading article on this lecture, and Mr. Jacks' article in the current Hibbert Journal on "The Church and the World," concluding with a severe indictment of a growing effeminacy and superstitious folly on the ritualistic side in the Church of England.

IN aid of the Boston Conference Fund, as will be seen from the advertisement in another column, a performance of that clever and very amusing comedy His Excellency the Governor is to be given, under the direction of Mr. H. B. Lawford, on Wednesday evening, Nov. 21, at the King's Hall, King-street, Covent-garden. This pleasant social effort in a good cause is being promoted by a joint committee of the Laymen's Club and the Women's Social Club. Among those taking part in the performance are Miss Adelaide Dresser, Miss Janet Oram, Mr. Walter Odgers, and Mr. Herbert Lawford himself. Our readers will know, therefore, that they are assured of a capital performance, and the evening will furnish, as we trust, not only an occasion for the pleasant reunion of many friends, but also a substantial contribution to the Boston Fund.

PARLIAMENT has reassembled, and its doings promise to be for some time of a very interesting, not to say exciting, character. There are several highly controversial Bills to be discussed, but attention chiefly centres upon the Education Bill. Readers will remember that, having passed the Commons, this measure went to the Upper House, where it passed the second reading before Parliament adjourned for the holidays. As a rule, the second reading is interpreted as a general sanction to the essential principles of a Bill; but several peers made speeches reserving their right to introduce transforming "amendments" in committee. It is now to be seen what amendments will be forced against the express will of the Lower House. Some fear has arisen that grave constitutional conflicts are before us; we shall see whether the House of Lords as a whole is so closely wedded to clerical ideals that, for their sake, it is willing to dare the worst. We hope not.

IN one respect the situation has materially changed since the recess began. The "West Riding" decision of the Court of Appeal apparently left the Government in the position of being able to inflict severe loss on the clerical party through their teachers. But so many difficulties have arisen in consequence of that decision that the Government have decided to carry the case to the Supreme Court. They have been blamed for foregoing what seemed a secure party advantage; but no serious-minded person can regret that they have set the public good in the first place. If they are to amend the law they must surely know first what the law is; and, meanwhile, they have to administer it, whether they can amend it or not. The whole question is almost as difficult as ever—we say almost, because there appears to be general agreement on some important points, e.g., public control of publicly supported schools, and co-ordination of the various branches of education. Let us hope that wise counsels will prevail, and that further agreement will be reached before the end of the session. We observe that the subject is down for discussion at the Council of the B. & F.U.A. on Tuesday next.

LONDON has its own special Educational difficulty in the question of administration. Experience has amply proved the accuracy of our forecast as to the result of thrusting the enormous work of the late School Board upon the already sufficiently weighty County Council. We suppose nobody denies now that the experiment has failed. The work has lacked the close and skilled attention it should have had on the part of the public representatives, and has fallen more and more into the hands of the official staff. What that means is best understood by those who have any part in the management of the schools, but its effect can be readily imagined by outsiders. A proposal has now been made to add sixty more members to the Council, and in other ways to remedy the present mischief without recurring to a body elected ad hoc. As the Council is to be elected early next year, any legislative steps necessary must be considered almost immediately.

THE National Union of Women Workers has this week been holding its annual conference at Tunbridge Wells. The conference was opened by Mrs. Creighton, who delivered an address on "Parental Control and the Development of Individuality within the Home." Among many interesting suggestions, we notice this, that children should constantly be called on to make their own decisions, and we seem to recall some children who did not need any encouragement to do this. Dealing with the case of the elder girls, Mrs. Creighton entered a plea for their being brought up to do some work, and further that they should not refuse to do paid work. Of course there are still many homes where the father would feel to have lost cast "in the City," if a daughter of his were known to be engaged in any useful occupation. Mrs. Creighton further entered a protest against girls accepting "pocket money wages." It is one of the cruellest things a woman can do, for it means that her sisters who have really to earn their living must live on what to her is but pocket money.

WOMEN have suffered of late years through the recent reforms in Local Government, but the temporary set-back to the employment of women on local bodies can hardly last much longer. Not to mention the activity of the increasingly powerful Women's Local Government Association, a long step forward has been taken. The London County Council has resolved to ask for a Bill increasing its numbers to 200, and to make women eligible as councillors. It is not too early to be moving, unless we wish altogether to lose the services of women in local administration. There seems to be something like a consensus of opinion that when the present Poor Law goes into the melting pot, it will emerge without the existing Boards of Guardians. If so, the last body on which women can sit will have gone.

AN important international inquiry into the methods and results of moral training in schools at home and abroad has been initiated this month in London, which promises to have far-reaching consequences. The nature of the inquiry is set forth in an appeal, which is being issued to those who are interested in the moral education of the young. It is signed by the Bishops of Ripon, Hereford, and Stepney; the Right Hon. Sir Edward Fry, late Lord Justice of Appeal, Judge of the International High Court of the Hague; the Right Hon. A. Dyke Acland, former Minister of Education; Sir Oliver Lodge, Principal of the University of Birmingham; the Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D. (of Nottingham); Mr. Harold Johnson, Secretary of the Moral Instruction League; and Prof. M. E. Sadler, LL.D., who is acting as Hon. Sec. at 8, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C.

THE appeal contains the following statement:—"Many efforts have been made in recent years to strengthen the character-forming influences of the schools in the United Kingdom, the United States of America, France, Germany, Denmark, Japan, and elsewhere. No systematic attempt, however, has yet been made to focus the results of this varied experience. It is proposed, therefore, to institute an inquiry, conducted by trained investigators, who would ascertain the conclusions which the best authorities in the different countries have reached as the outcome of their recent efforts. It is hoped to complete this inquiry and to publish the reports of the investigators by the autumn of 1907. In this way the movement for strengthening the moral and civic training given in the schools will have the advantage of starting from the solid basis of a scientific survey of the whole field. It is therefore proposed to form a temporary International Committee for the purpose of organising this inquiry. The Committee for the United Kingdom will work in concert with corresponding Committees which are being formed in the United States of America, France, and other countries."

MR. EDWIN ARMSTRONG writes in reply to Mr. Robinson's letter of last week, saying that while he cannot offer a remedy for the evils of poverty, the first thing to be done is to obtain a clear idea of the facts of the present situation. And he adds:—"The two facts the perception of which Mr. Robinson's article appeared to me to obscure, are, first that less coal is required in summer than in winter, and second that the cost of getting coal is vastly more than 2s. 6d. per ton. I therefore conclude, firstly, that the cause of the short time worked in summer at the pits is not the avariciousness of the colliery owners, whether it be true or not that the colliery owners of a certain district made an unprofitable attempt last summer to keep up the price of coal by limiting their output; and, also, secondly, that the cause of low wages is not to be found in the enormous profits of the colliery owners. I may explain that my rough estimate of 7s. to 8s. as the cost per ton included the 4d. to 6d. which is the amount of royalty paid, and also rates, taxes, workmen's compensation, &c."

ONE thing that Unitarians and members of the kindred churches might learn from the Methodists is a certain audacity of utterance. The other day there was an announcement somewhat like this:—"The Rev. A. B. will speak on Gospel miracles and several Gospel miracles will speak." Daring, but sufficiently suggestive. How would it be if one of us were to announce:—"B. A. will speak on the Love of the Heavenly Father, and several sons of God will speak." In any case it will be by such sons of God as we are able to produce that our Gospel of the Father will be judged.

THE religious newspapers have had many times recently to refer to a comparative lack of enthusiasm for foreign missions. The "annual missionary meeting," with the usual number, or an extra number, of able speakers, and a live missionary to give immediate testimony, does not draw the crowd or evoke the enthusiasm that once would have been confidently expected. The hesitation that has made missionary workers anxious is not wholly an evil. It is leading to a reconsideration that will bring about a better understanding between the teacher and the taught; it may lead sometimes to a very interesting exchange of function between the two. As was remarked the other day by the President of the United Methodist Free Churches: "An intelligent foreigner might bid them solve home problems before sending out missionaries to reform strange lands. He did not know what objection they could reasonably urge if the Chinese were to propose to send missionaries to win England from drunkenness to sobriety." A well-organised attempt at reciprocity in spiritual endeavour would, perhaps, be more beneficial than the commerce by which on one side the supplies exceed the demand, and, on the other, the most elementary wants are not satisfied.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CHRISTIANITY IN THE LIGHT OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.*

OPENING ADDRESS BY THE PRINCIPAL,
THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
M.A., D.LITT.

[The first four sections of this address appeared in last week's INQUIRER.]

V.

In modern times, however, the experience of communion with the living Christ is earnestly pressed upon us as the essence of Evangelical religion. It is especially connected with certain crises of the moral and spiritual life, the conviction of sin, and the sense of forgiveness. But it is by no means limited to these. The whole sphere of personal welfare and of the interior desires day by day is referred to him. Have we need of divine help in the struggle with evil temper, with envy, jealousy, or base ambition? Do we want strength in the weariness of daily duty? Do we seek increase of faith in seasons of doubt, or in moments of peril exclaim "Save, Lord, we perish"? The answering aid guarantees the reality of the object of our petitions, and becomes the inexpugnable witness of the truth. There is an apparent finality about this evidence which makes any attempt to analyse it seem like a rude intrusion into the sanctuary;

And like a man in wrath the heart
Stands up and answers, I have felt.

But the teacher who does not share the specific forms of these experiences, must needs desire if he can to learn from their exponents how to recognise the validity of their interpretation. The soul is, by hypothesis, in contact with a mighty spiritual power, other than itself and yet within. The question is, under what forms this power is to be recognised. How can we identify it with a historic figure like the living Christ in two natures, divine and human, the manhood being taken into God? If we ask the most learned of Wesleyan divines, Dr. Beet, we shall be informed that this power is no other than the Spirit. It is the Spirit that dwells in the heart of the believer. It is the Spirit that is the source of graces of faith, hope, and love. It is the Spirit that operates on conscience and affection, and the Spirit is only identified with Christ by a text in St. Paul. Or the Presbyterian, Dr. Forrest, will admit to us that by no conscious distinction can the soul mark off its communion with the Son from communion with the Father; agreeing in this, it would seem, with the German mystic Suso, nearly six centuries ago, who laid down that in the highest condition of union with God the soul takes no note of persons separately. The Scotch theologian, therefore, also recognises that he knows that Christ is there only because the Scripture witness tells him; and so we are once more referred back to history. Does the Congregationalist, Dr. Dale, affirm that the record is not needed? Though the

* An Address delivered at the opening of the Session, on Monday, October 15. Dr. Carpenter's Address at the opening of the previous Session, on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science," appeared in the INQUIRER of October 21, 1905, and has also been separately published by the College. The present Address is also to be so published immediately.

Gospels should be blotted from the scroll of time, the testimony of the Church would be sufficient; is there not a continuity of experience for which Augustine and Luther vouch? The Presbyterian demurs; amid the liabilities of extravagance and illusion authority is needed to regulate and correct. In other words the experience of "the living Christ" does not, after all, authenticate itself. It needs a recognised standard for its guarantee; and that which is invoked to render historic testimony credible, and provide a spiritual vindication of traditional record, requires after all the confirmation of the very authority which it is summoned to support.

I will not now ask how far this type of teaching about the conditions of divine forgiveness coincides with that of Jesus himself. I am not here concerned with ultimate theological truths but with the historic forms of the religious life. The majority of Christendom has fashioned its faith upon other lines, and found the secret of strength not in the Evangelical individualism of the work of the Spirit, but in the Catholic conception of sacramental communion. The stress here falls upon the Church with its hierarchy and powers, conceived as the mystic body of Christ; and the Anglican student of Christian mysticism accordingly tells us that "what joins us to Christ is not so much a unity of the individual soul with the heavenly Christ as an organic unity with all men." The central idea of Eucharistic devotion is still, as with Paul, the Passion. But it is worked out in a totally different way. In the daily sacrifice of the mass it is repeated in bloodless fashion on tens of thousands of altars, and the believer in communicating actually feeds upon his Lord. Every student of the Middle Ages knows how exalted was the faith which gathered round the consecrated elements. The enthusiasm of holy adventure poured itself into the legends of the Grail which Tennyson has transmuted for us into permanent types of spiritual endeavour, failure, and achievement. The rapture of union, present more or less in Christian literature ever since Origen interpreted the Song of Songs in terms of the mystic bride of Christ, thrilled through Augustine, and inspired the fiery Bernard or the brothers of St. Victor, Richard and Hugh. If the incidents of impassioned experience are to determine the forms of faith, let the student consider the work wrought, for example, by Catherine of Siena on her turbulent age. The house still stands at the bottom of one of the hills within the city walls where, in 1367, at the age of twenty, she espoused herself to the virgin Christ. Pass into the great church of San Domenico on the heights hard by, and you enter at the foot of the nave the little Capella delle Volte. It was the scene of many a divine colloquy where she conversed familiarly with Jesus Christ, her spouse. There she gave a little silver cross which she had threaded on her rosary to a poor man, who was none other than her heavenly Lord, who afterwards told her that he would show it on the judgment day to the whole world. There occurred those two strange visions, the first on July 18, 1370, when Christ took away her heart, the second two days later when he reappeared bearing in his hand a rosy heart of flame which he placed in her side; and from that time no contradiction could disturb her. In the chapel dedicated to her further up the nave stands a little wooden crucifix brought from a church at Pisa, where the saint had once knelt before it at communion; and Christ (so her confessor Raimund relates) had descended from the cross and imparted to her the sacred wounds. And all the while in the midst of intense bodily suffering she is sustained with a holy joy, as she tends the sick, ministers to the lepers, comforts the plague-stricken, heals the feuds of the nobles, reconciles the enemies of the state; and at length by sheer might of spiritual influence, in the face of a corrupted papal court—stabbed in the foot by the Pope's own niece as she knelt in prayer before the altar—she brings back Gregory XI. from Avignon to Rome, and terminates the long exile satirically known as the Babylonish captivity. Unconsumed by incessant toil she conducts an immense correspondence, and composes the dialogues of the soul with Christ, in which (to use the words of the most learned and sympathetic English student of her time) we seem to hear "Catherine's rendering into finite words of unspeakable things which she has learned by intuition in that half-hour during which there is silence in heaven." No one can follow the phases of this extraordinary union of the mystical and the practical without the conviction that her energy was fed from unseen springs: must not the Evangelical critic who regards the Catholic faith in transubstantiation as illusory, admit with her confessor, Brother Raimund, "We are in the valley, and we presume to judge concerning what is on the summit of the mountain"?

Or turn to Paris in the most brilliant age of France. Study the life of one, rich, beautiful, accomplished, but unhappily married. On July 22, 1672, she signs a covenant sent to her by her friend, Genevieve Granger, a Benedictine prioress. "I henceforth take Jesus Christ to be mine, and I give myself to him, unworthy though I am, to be his spouse. I ask of him in this marriage of spirit with spirit that I may be of the same mind with him, meek, pure, nothing in myself, and united in God's will. And, pledged as I am to be his, I accept as a part of my marriage portion the temptations and sorrows, the crosses and contempt, which fell to him." Read the story of her philanthropies, her friendships, her imprisonments. It is Mme. Guion, whose hymns through Cowper's translation have long been part of our English devotion. To her, too, as to the devout nuns of Port Royal, the secret of strength in sorrow and suffering and persecution lay in the august privilege of the Eucharist. "O happy minds and blessed souls," says Thomas à Kempis, "who have the privilege of receiving thee, their God, with devout affection, and in so receiving thee are permitted to be full of spiritual joy."

There was, however, another aspect of Christ in mediæval thought. If in the one character he was seen again and again as a gentle child or tender lamb within the holy bread, at other times he loomed vast and dreadful as the Rex tremendæ majestatis, the judge who hurled the sinner into hell. Already, in the fresco attributed to Orcagna, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, he stands in the terrific attitude in which Michael Angelo afterwards depicted him in the Sistine chapel. There, however, the Virgin Mary appears as intercessor, just as in other schemes of thought Christ had himself interposed for sinners before the Father's wrath. Everyone knows how many are the elements which contributed to exalt her as she rose before the believer, head of all martyrs, queen of the heavenly choir, protectress of the family and the state, mother of the Creator and spouse of God. By her obedience, purity, humility, and self-sacrifice, she takes part with the Trinity in the Incarnation, and thus has her share in the redemption of the world. She even participates in the Passion of her Son, offers him to the Father, and realises at least the anguish of consent. Once more, I am not concerned with the truth of theologic forms, but with the manifestations of religious experience. The whole of life is entrusted to her care. Her joys, her sorrows, become the spiritual types to which the believer looks and is enlightened. The great monastic orders laid their self-renunciations at her feet. In her name and to her chastity was knighthood consecrated. She was the inspiration of poetry, and the supreme object of art. The peasant among the mountains still places his home and his fields under her guardianship; and the cultivated people of the city find in her no less their refuge and strength. Wandering one day among the ecclesiastical antiquities of Paris, I entered a chapel in one of the oldest churches in the Latin quarter. Its walls from floor to roof were crowded with hundreds of tablets which all told the same tale with strange monotony. They all belonged to the terrible year 1870-1871. Here were recorded the fulfillments of vows for husband, father, brother, and son, serving in the trenches during the siege. Here were thanksgivings for deliverance, for rescue from danger by wounds, famine, or disease, during that dreadful winter, as whole families were united in safety and in faith. It was a spectacle of infinite pathos. What suffering, what anxiety, what consolation! For the desires that were not granted there were no tablets of resignation. But if religion is to be founded upon experience in answer to prayer, how can the Evangelical deny the Catholic's plea?

VI.

But the argument may be carried one step further. If we discern "One Gospel in many Dialects" within the limits of the New Testament, if the Christian churches, age after age, produce fresh varieties of sacred speech, intelligible at least to their day and generation, by the exaltation of the few or the faith of the many, what shall be said of the other voices in the great chorus of the world's religions? Are they not, too, members of the same wide fraternity of tongues? It was a saying of Augustine that there is no false doctrine which fails to contain some truth—Nulla falsa doctrina est quæ non aliqua vera intermisceat. Had Augustine ever read the "Lord's Song" or Bhagavad-Gītā, the most sacred book of the followers of Vishnu, he would have found a remarkable application of his principle. It comes to us incorporated in one of the two colossal epics of Indian literature, the Mahābhārata. There it is strangely inserted as an episode in the struggle between the sons of Pāṇḍu and the son of Kuru. The hosts on either side are arrayed for battle, when the knight Arjuna (one of the sons of Pāṇḍu) stricken with remorse at the approaching slaughter, addresses Krishna, who acts as his charioteer. Krishna is, in fact, the incarnation of the beneficent god, Vishnu, creator and sustainer of the world. He answers with a discourse on the heavenly wisdom or mystic knowledge by which the believer shall be freed from sin, and united in spirit with the universal Lord. In its present place it would seem to have received additions in the interest of more than one philosophic school. Its date cannot be determined with any certainty, though there is good reason for thinking that its earliest form may be carried back at least two centuries before our era. It breathes so exalted a piety that it has been gravely argued that it had felt, though far off, the touch of Christ. The attempt of an enthusiastic German, Dr. Lorinser (1869), to prove that its author was acquainted with all the Gospels, the Book of Acts, and all the Epistles except those to the Thessalonians, Philemon, and the Hebrews, has not, indeed, found any support. But when so cautious a scholar as Professor Hopkins (of Pennsylvania) makes an elaborate comparison of it with the Fourth Gospel, his argument in favour of the dependence of the Indian poem, though not to me convincing, must be heard with respect. The higher thought of India (as is well known) soared far above the traditional scriptures with their superstructures of ritual and law. These belonged to the lower scheme of works and merit, which detained the agent in the round of transmigration. From this the philosophy of religion sought to lead him into the world of spiritual reality beyond all change. The Pauline gospel was more closely involved in legal categories, especially in its account of the death of Christ by which the Law was proved to have undone itself. The Hindu sage is not embarrassed by the necessity of linking the incarnate Vishnu with the ceremonial system. The conceptions of divine promise and purpose, which play so large a part in Pauline thought, are lacking in India, and law and ritual could be more easily referred to a lower plane. The language of sacrifice which gathers round the person of the Messiah finds no place, therefore, in the story of Krishna. He is the incarnation of Vishnu sent forth to deliver men from their sins, to overcome the powers of evil, and to establish the rule of righteousness on earth. His death, however, by the stray shaft of a hunter, who implores his forgiveness and is immediately sent to the world above in a heavenly car, possesses no kind of redemptive value. In a scheme which provided an exact moral equivalent for every thought and act of good or evil, according to the doctrine of the Deed (Karma), no form of vicarious atonement was possible. On the other hand, above the religion of works rises, in the "Lord's Song," the religion of bhakti, fervent devotion or love. The ultimate principle of salvation, indeed, as in the Fourth Gospel, is knowledge. "Coming into this knowledge," says the Lord, "men become one in nature with me." But this knowledge is attained through fervent love. "By love he knows me in truth, who and what I am; then knowing me in truth he forthwith enters into me." "Have thy mind on me, thy love towards me, thy sacrifice (used metaphorically of worship) toward me; do homage to me." "Abandoning all righteous deeds (i.e., reliance on works as the means of salvation), see me as thy sole refuge. I will deliver thee from all sins." The doctrine of "mutual inherence," as the late Dr. Moberly designated the Pauline and Johannine view of the relations of the believer and Christ, reappears in the promise of Krishna to the disciple: "They that worship me with love dwell in me, and I in them." And the salvation of the true believer, however guilty be his past, is sure: "Even though he be a doer of exceeding evil that worships me with undivided worship, he shall be deemed good, for he is of right purpose. Speedily he becomes righteous of soul, and comes to lasting peace. O son of Kunti be assured that none who is devoted to me is lost." The demand of God from man, the condition of true worship, is love. The response of God to man is expressed in prasāda, identified in the physical world with clearness or radiance; in the inner realm with calmness and serenity of mind, or, when directed towards others, with favour or grace. This is the ultimate possession of the believer: "If thou hast thy thought on me, thou shalt by my grace pass over all hard ways." "In him seek refuge with thy whole soul; by his grace thou shalt win supreme peace, the everlasting realm." Here, then, is a religion of incarnation, which is at the same time a religion of revelation and deliverance; and Krishna declares: "I am born age after age for the saving of the good, the destruction of evildoers, and the establishing of virtue (or religion)." Religiously the world is the creation of a gracious God. It is brought forth by his free grace, and his beneficence in its production becomes the type for his human worshipper. He guides its course, holding the door of deliverance open to all who seek it; and accordingly we read: "He who serves me with unswerving endeavour of love becomes fit for the partaking of the divine nature (Brahmahood). For I am the image of Brahma, of the eternal and infinite, of the everlasting truth, and of absolute joy."

The story of Hindu theology is full of bewildering intricacies which are hardly likely even to arouse the passing interest of the ordinary Western believer. But they are assuredly of profound significance to the student of religious experience. For similar facts must be explained by similar causes; and corresponding types of trust and endeavour imply like play of thought upon the vicissitudes of the spirit within. Why, asked the ancient sages long before, should some men have reached the vision of reality, and discerned the identity of the self within the heart with "the True of the True," the absolute and universal? It was because their eyes had been opened, and the Great Self had chosen them for his own. Here was already a doctrine of election; the religion of devotion or love readily suggested a variety of fresh problems which the subtle speculative activity of the Hindu mind delighted to throw into quaint imaginative forms. Was salvation due to the irresistible and free action of God, or did it depend in any way on the co-operation of man? Where lay the initiative, in divine grace or human endeavour? The disputants on the one side advanced the argument of the cat. "God seizes the soul," they urged, "and saves it, just as a cat carries away its little ones from danger." "Nay, rather," replied the advocates on the other, with the argument of the monkey, "the soul seizes hold of God, and saves itself by him, just as the young one of the monkey escapes from peril by clinging to its mother's side." And out of these dilemmas arose yet another. How can God, if he is just, and good, resolve to choose some and pass over others? Or, from the counter point of view, if he is Almighty, how can there be action of human wills independent or opposed to his? Or yet, again, when faith and grace have once been given, can they be forfeited, or is the perseverance of the saints assured?

Why should I fetch these items of controversy out of the obscurity of a distant land? For two reasons:—In the first place they warn us against what may be called provincialism in religion. The types of faith and life with which we are familiar, are not all unknown elsewhere. The mysteries of God and the secrets of the soul have been the age-long objects of devout thought without as well as within the pale of Christendom. But, secondly, they have never had so firm a seat in specific human personalities. They have not been embodied in a great tradition which guarded their noblest forms against dispersal in vague clouds of myth. No one would compare the legends of Krishna in the Purāṇas with the story of the Gospels, except for some curiosity of occasional detail. The Christian student for the ministry of religion returns, therefore, to the first interpreters of Christian experience, the first creators of Christian theology, to Paul and John. Is it simply to repeat their phrases? Nay, but to get back through them to the Master who stands above them both. The reply to the philosophic inquirer who seeks for the differentiation of Christianity among the religions of the world, is not difficult to find. Paul and John have the same explanations. In Pauline language it is "the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." The Johannine Jesus uses the same great word: "I am come that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." And this spirit has two aspects. As it looks out on man it begets human helpfulness:—"I am in the midst of you as he that serveth." As it looks up to God it prompts the surrender of sonship:—"Father, not my will but thine be done." Here are the inspirations of duty and faith. Service and trust must be the two keys of your future work. I do not say that they will unlock all mysteries. There are secrets of discipline and destiny which God keeps in reserve: they are known only to those who enter into the joy of their Lord. But on these two mighty impulses the vast fabric of the Church has been erected. We have been told lately that in the teaching of religion, even to children, the Gospels must be interpreted by the Church. I believe that to be profoundly true, if we are agreed on what we mean by the Church. If we have only in view the decisions of its councils and the propositions of its creeds, it is sufficient to reply that the clauses of the Quicumque vult do not help me to understand the Sermon on the Mount. But if we have regard to the totality of believers, one great fact will emerge through all varieties of doctrine and rite. The fundamental and impelling power that unifies the whole, that sends the missionary to distant lands, or the martyr to the stake, or the scholar to his desk, or the nun to her works of charity, or the Sunday School teacher to his class—that keeps the great host of faithful workers in all times and lands for God and man at their posts of duty, and sustains the “dim common populations” as they bear the sorrows and endure the hardships of our mortal lot—is the imitatio Christi, the effort, how often inarticulate and baffled, but never wholly futile, to appropriate and reproduce some element in the experience of Jesus. This is the witness of Christian history, and this is what makes its study an aid of the highest importance to the Christian minister. We are learning now that the fellowship of the Spirit of Life is wider than any creed, and God gives us access to it in many different ways. He who seeks to be its minister to other men, must learn to carry it into fields unvisited by Jesus; into the devotion to truth, which is the glory of science, and the love of beauty, which is the secret of poetry and art; into the industrial enterprises reared on the toil of the people; into the purposes of civic and national welfare in the great fight with ignorance and suffering and sin; nay, I may add, into the obscure impulses which bring races and civilisations into conflict, and the means which may secure the pre-eminence of the Prince of Peace. Be not alarmed. You are not called to do all these things at once. But you are called to recognise that as life slowly tends to grow more complex, the demands upon the ministry will continually increase. I set before you, therefore, high aims, and I ask you to give to the College your best energies. On the threshold of a venerable chapel in Numidia was carved the inscription, Bonus intra, melior exi. The aspiration of the ancient worshipper may well become the modern student. A college that is dedicated “to truth, to liberty, to religion,” must needs be a sanctuary of faith and prayer. I cannot predict for you an easy life: you are content to face the unknown future with a cheerful trust. The lines will not always fall to you in pleasant places, and you may be early confronted with grim facts of failure or pain. But if you have learned the lesson of discipleship, and are able to say in humble confidence with the Apostle Paul “Our sufficiency is of God,” the wonder and the joy of your work will grow even through frequent trial and possible defeat. You may find but small opportunities; your message may only reach a few; you may be for ever haunted by the sense of your inadequacy to realise the greatness of your calling; you may have little share in the redemptive labours of our age; you may be excluded from precious fellowship which would sustain your spirit; what then? You will be ministers of God—God always working, always teaching, always loving; God known in the grandeur of the world; God revealed in the mighty growth of the human spirit; God recognised by the testimony of innumerable faithful souls; God calling us for ever forwards to new knowledge, clearer vision, wider truth; God our infinite source, and God our everlasting goal. And in weakness and obscurity you will still raise the song, “O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past tracing out! For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever. Amen.”

It is superfluous at the beginning of its fifth year to speak of the success of the Hibbert Journal. The circulation it has attained and, even more, the influence it exerts must have far surpassed the expectations of the editor and his fellow-workers and friends. We can only rejoice again in the great work which the Hibbert Journal is doing, and express our sense of the deep debt owing to Mr. Jacks for the untiring energy and the wise judgment with which he conducts the affairs of the journal.

The present number is especially notable for the unrest which it manifests in the world of religious thought. It is not, however, the unrest of growing scepticism or negative opinions, but the unrest of a deeper faith desiring freedom from outworn forms, of trying to find expression for a larger, richer religious thought of life. We are not surprised to hear of men of all classes in all parts of the world finding in the Hibbert Journal guidance and strength for their mental and moral life.

The Editor's article on “Church and World” merits a longer notice than we can give it here. It is a fine vindication of the moral worth of the so-called secular world of to-day. In an article published a year ago upon the Japanese, Mr. Jacks suggested that European Christianity was in need of more humility, and that it had much to learn from the moral strength displayed by a non-Christian nation. In his present article he suggests that the Christian Churches, with their great organisations and their large claims, are in need of more humility, and that they have much to learn from the moral strength displayed by the so-called secular world. Mr. Jacks draws an impressive contrast between the veracity of science and the veracity of the churches.

“A passion for vague engagements seems to have possessed the intellect of the churches. In the sphere of religious belief men may pledge themselves to all sorts of issues without feeling committed to this or that. A liberty of private interpretation is claimed for solemn and public undertakings. Language when applied to the expression of religious belief seems to have a different set of values from those carried in other departments of thought. Elsewhere words are supposed to convey something; here they may convey almost anything. Not only has it become impossible to say what a particular dogma means, but highly difficult to say what it does not mean; for there is hardly a conceivable meaning which ingenuity may not contrive to fix on the words. . . . While religious teaching has been falling into these feeble and vacillating habits, science has been setting an example of stern responsibility in the use of languages. . . . The habit of science is straightforward, exacting, uncompromising, direct. Therefore the conscience of mankind is on the side of science. After all, there is no moral conception so powerful in human life as the idea of truth; there is none which carries in it an influence so vital over the characters of communities and men, and gathers round it such strong reinforcements of moral sympathy.” We should probably misunderstand Mr. Jacks if we regard these charges as only brought against creed-bound churches. There is a danger of loose thought and loose expression in all who speak about religion, and it would be well for all of us to feel we have something to learn in veracity from such men as John Stuart Mill or Professor Huxley. Nowhere can you find that profound sense of the importance of truth more finely expressed than in a letter of Huxley to Charles Kingsley. “The longer I live, the more obvious it is to me that the most sacred act of a man's life is to say and to feel, ‘I believe such and such to be true.’ All the greatest rewards and all the heaviest penalties of existence cling about that act.” At the same time, Mr. Jacks, perhaps, presses the contrast between theological looseness and scientific exactitude further than is wholly justifiable. The subject of theology is beyond the senses, it is vaster than the highest thought and imagination. There must be something of the mystic in every great theologian, and something of the poet. We demand scientific precision and impartiality from him when he is discussing the authorship of Mark's Gospel or the Virgin Birth, but when he is speaking of God we should rather expect a passion, a creative imagination and a sense of infinite mystery which cannot find expression in clear-cut dogmas or scientific arguments. This, of course, does not justify unveracity. The greatness of the subject only makes unveracity more blasphemous. But it ought to make us especially careful not to impute unveracity to every vague statement or to every teacher who uses symbolism and metaphor as partial presentations of a truth beyond his grasp.

Mr. Jacks, for all his admiration of the world and his feeling of its innate goodness, does not, it need hardly be said, wish the Church abolished or think that the world could get on better without it.

“As Constitutional Head, as the embodiment of the organising spirit of the common life, men are seeking the Church, and in that capacity are ready to endow her with higher and wider functions than she has ever possessed. They need her to voice the Purpose which planted in the world from the beginning, makes it Divine—a Church begotten of the inner and perfect essence of the World, and belonging to it as universally as Reason belongs to humanity; a Church which shall deal with the World as Christ dealt with the sinner, continually revealing it to itself as good, until her message becomes the speech of the World's higher self and her mission the reflection of the World's ultimate desire." While accepting gratefully and admiringly this noble description of the work of the true Church, we could have wished Mr. Jacks had referred a little more definitely to the unique and special function of the Church, the provision of public worship. However much the best men of the world may care for truth and right, however capable they are of knowing God without instruction from the Church, they do not find in the world, with all its virtues, that one thing which has been from the beginning of Christianity an essential part of the religious life and which, we believe, must remain so. The Church has no right to play the tyrant either in doctrines or morals. But as providing public worship it has a function all its own. No doubt one reason for the abstention of good men from public worship is due to the faults of the churches in not providing a more adequate and beautiful and sincere expression for the need of united worship which is in all religious men. But there is just a possibility that thoughtful, earnest men may find an excuse for laziness or independence in the faults of public worship, and, instead of helping the Church to improve, may relapse into a lonely indifference to the Church, which in the end is not only harmful to the Church but perilous for their own full religious life.

One of the most striking articles which has appeared in the Hibbert Journal for some time is that by the well-known singer, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies. There is a suppressed emotion and an intensity of religious conviction about this article which makes it very impressive. It is not argument, but the revelation of a singer's life, and of the meaning of religion for him. It is an example of the very thing for which Mr. Jacks has been contending—the essential sacredness of so-called secular employments. Mr. Davies describes how he began life as a clergyman, but soon felt he was "getting a living under false pretences." "He gave up his position and faced the world. He began to work with a very small voice as a vocal student. He had lost his God in man's theology. For many years he was a wanderer—a prodigal, if you will. But he finally found his God in Art." Later, he goes on, "As an artist I have been severely handled because I have insisted that Art and Life are inseparable, and because I do not know where to begin my Art except in God. 'Why will you mix up Art and Religion? They are two different things.' Every day, in one form or another, I am assailed with these objections. I know now that God is, that He is One, and I believe that in Christ we have that revelation of Him which enables teacher and pupil, in whatsoever sphere, to reproduce the beneficent, creative thought. Constantly, when at my public work, I relate myself in consciousness to our Brother Christ, and I am never left comfortless. Without Him I should fail, for conditions are lethal in public performances often enough." There is a ring of reality about this personal confession. We feel that Mr. Davies does not sing for favour, and that he does not depend on technical excellence alone, but that religion is the source of all his strength. We do not wonder as we read him that he is one of the great singers of the present day, and that in such a rôle as "Elijah" he is unsurpassed. He has some very wise and noble words on religious teaching in Board Schools. "Teach 'God' for fifteen minutes and 'secular' matter, which means, if anything, 'not God,' during the rest of the day! I cannot see why the thought of Truth, Life, Love, of God, should be absent from a mathematical or a geographical lesson, any more than from one of my own singing lessons. And I make bold to say that the man who teaches even such things as mathematics or geography on the lines of Truth and Love will succeed. Art, religion, education—all manifestations of mind go hand in hand, and peace and knowledge are their fruits."

We ministers are continually insisting on the sacredness of all honourable work. "God cares less for the verbs than the adverbs," less for what we do than for the spirit in which it is done. Here is a man whose whole success and power is based on that conviction. That fatal separation between Art and Religion or Education and Religion is impossible for him. Religion is not a special study, nor is it especially embodied in priests or churches. It is the source and strength of all good work everywhere. The simple and beautiful self-revelation and religious depth of this article is something which we must receive with reverence and gratitude.

Other articles must be referred to in very few words. Professor Muirhead gives one of the clearest and wisest justifications of the present Education Bill that we have read. He denies Bishop Gore's contention that it was brought in as a political necessity, and that its supporters do not really think it just. Professor Muirhead, while certainly free from party bias, and writing with the detachment of the true philosopher, believes thoroughly in the justice of the present Education Bill, and replies very forcibly to the criticisms of Bishop Gore. This article should be read by all who wish to escape from the confusion which the controversy has raised, and to see plainly the principles on which the Bill is based.

Mr. Sturt pleads for a Theism independent of Christianity as the need of the time. He does not like the Christianity of Christ any more than the Christianity of the Churches, and regards Christian ethics as inadequate in some directions and impossible in others. This desire for a brand new religion is always suspicious. It usually marks a man without historic imagination, without insight into the past, and without a feeling of the corporate relationship in which we are all bound up. "Come, let us found a new religion and ignore the past" is easily said. It is the outcome of lonely thinking in vacuo. We believe it is neither a practicable nor a desirable method of religious progress. Most people who dismiss lightly the ethical and religious teaching of Jesus do so either from want of critical sagacity and knowledge of the Gospels, or from a failure of insight into the spirit of Jesus.

"A Dialogue on Eternal Punishment," by a Jesuit, is a very irritating article. A carefully reasoned argument on this subject would be of great interest if written by some one who thoroughly believes in it. But a dialogue in which the opponent of the belief hardly ever says anything which ought to be said, in which he is a lay-figure to be scored off and triumphantly crushed, leaves a very unsatisfactory impression. Nobody ought to write in dialogue unless he can really sympathise with both sides, or, at any rate, unless he has imagination enough to see clearly the best that can be said on the other side. This virtue was conspicuously present in Plato, and is conspicuously absent in the writer of the present article.

In conclusion, a word ought to be said as to the great value and interest of the Bibliography at the end of the Hibbert Journal. It is a very special feature of the journal, and is always done with admirable care and skill. We believe that Dr. Hicks, the sub-editor, is responsible for this. It must involve enormous reading and the power to express the essential meaning of a book in a few words, which probably demands more labour, and certainly requires more thought, than the reading itself. AU REVOIR, AU RELIRE!

To the Author of "The Gentle Reader."

GENTLE AUTHOR, shall you go
Now we've learned to like you so?
Truer lovers cannot be
In that land across the sea.

Wherefore nestle in our heart,
If you meant that we should part?
Swallows come and flit away—
Are you fickle, then, as they?

Language—nearly, humour quite,
You with Britain's best unite;
All-but Briton, won't you stay
Till the all-but fades away?

Go, then—if you can—and tell
Yonder Land you love her well,
While she chuckles, as of old,
At a tale so quaintly told.

Yet, my Gentle Author, know
From our heart you shall not go;
Wander, yonder, where you will—
You're the Gentle Reader's still.

W. G. TARRANT.

THE Church at present divides: the ideal Church will unite.—S. M. Crothers.

OUR social order has not yet been thoroughly humanised and spiritualised. There are reforms which can only be accomplished by men who are willing to sacrifice themselves for the good of others. There must still be the spirit of the martyr, the willing witness to ideal righteousness. The field for this kind of activity is in what we call secular life. The spirit which leads any man to devote himself to that kind of activity is one that is in its very nature religious.—S. M. Crothers

OBITUARY.

MR. WALTER SCOTT, J.P.

THE congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Newry has suffered a great loss by the death of Mr. Walter Scott, J.P.

On Sunday week the Rev. G. V. Crook preached a memorial sermon, in the course of which he said:—

"Our deeply lamented friend and elder, Walter Scott, came of a Presbyterian family, who, in the controversy regarding subscription to the Westminster Confession, in the early years of last century, sided with those who held that character was of more importance than correctness of creed. After the disruption in 1829 the Scott family remained attached to what was from that time called the Remonstrant Congregation of Newry. His father was a man of ability and education. He edited a Newry newspaper, and we have evidence of his literary discernment in the fact that he was the first to recognise the merit of and to publish the beautiful poem of Charles Wolfe on the burial of Sir John Moore.

"Mr. Scott was born in April, 1839, and was baptized by Rev. John Mitchell, who was minister of this congregation during the disruption of 1829. No wonder then that Mr. Scott was a thorough-going Remonstrant Presbyterian—his hereditary characteristics and life-long career reveal the basal principle of Unitarianism—that the emphasis of life is to be put on man's conduct, not on his creed; on what he does, not on what he believes. Unitarianism is simply ethical Christianity. Mr. Scott adorned that ethical Christianity by a life of strictness, of moral severity felt by every one coming underneath his influence. That principle of moral integrity was the deepest trait in his character, it revealed itself in his business, on the Bench, and in the church. He was a man of few words, but behind those words lay a character so strongly governed by principle that, even when not fully agreeing with him, he forced you to think on his words, and no one could thoughtlessly side against him. Combined with that integrity was a courteousness and generosity (almost gone from our life to-day, one fears) which immensely added to his influence, and made his home attractive to outsiders. One always found in that home a nobility of thought and intention—a heart ever aspiring towards what is high, and noble and great, naturally attracted by a certain affinity with these, and naturally repelled, as if by instinct, from what is low and mean and little. In respecting himself Mr. Scott had always a just appreciation of others. Calm and equable, patient and forbearing, his life continually revealed the essence of Christianity—dignity, authority, justice, and generosity."

Mr. Crook went on to speak of the severe loss the death of Mr. Scott brought to them, since he had been a teacher in their school, secretary and treasurer of the congregation, trustee and elder, in each capacity working always for the peace and prosperity of the church.

"He walked with God. It is the loss of Walter Scott as a religious personality from this congregation—a religious force has been taken from us that we could ill spare—that is our greatest loss to-day. His influence was for God and righteousness in home, town, and Church."

XX.—CATHOLICITY.

THERE are two ideals of unity—distinct, but not opposed—nay, rather auxiliary one to the other—in the pages of the New Testament. One is the ideal of congregational unity. The unity is local. It is at Corinth, or Ephesus, or Rome; it may even be in the house of Nymphas, of Aquila and Priscilla, of Philemon. The other unity is universal. It is the unity of one body, many members. But sectional, denominational unity is not so much as named, or is named only to be denounced. Of Paul? Of Apollos? Is Christ divided?

There are those to-day to whom the idea of congregational unity is specially attractive, and there can be no doubt that in early Christian times the sense of brotherhood and spiritual fellowship found delightful and satisfying expression in the local fraternity. The same congregational spirit has worked very powerfully in the Dissenting communities of this country, making bonds of union even closer than those of the parochial system, within which it developed itself. But there are those also to whom the Catholic ideal, the ideal of corporate unity, comes with greater power of appeal. Unity with them is the unity of the whole, the glory of each part its relation to the whole; no church, not even a national church, can justify itself to them except as a Branch of a Church Universal. The City of God must lie four-square, or there can be no complete fulfilment of the one divine, all-informing, all-containing mind. Each ideal, the unity of the fraternity, and the unity of catholicity, has been productive of the highest good, and each has had its attendant danger. Here individualism has been too much encouraged, and there too much repressed. If there is that which Protestantism has gained, there is that also which Catholicism has not lost. But now there is a general movement towards social unity. We have begun to think collectively, and therefore to dislike religious division as a form of social division. The Catholic ideal, however imperfectly realised, is becoming more acceptable than the self-complacent, self-limiting particularism of the sects. It is felt more and more that the essentials of religion ought by their very nature to be reducible to terms of common acceptance. The unnamings of denominations will not be the work of one day, or of one generation, but it will come, and it is already time to ask whether any other unity was ever intended, or thought to be possible, than that unity of spirit—the spirit of reverent obedience—which breathes in the name Father, and is ready to make one in that name the children of His love.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Do you know the story of Enoch Arden as Tennyson tells it? That again was an example of noble heroism and unselfishness.

Enoch was a sailor, who grew up in a little fishing village, strong and brave, with two special friends, Annie Lee, and Philip Ray, the miller's only son. Both the boys loved Annie, and when they were grown up Enoch made her his wife. Then for seven happy years they lived together in their cottage home, and two children, a boy and girl, were born to them. But then trouble came, and Enoch was obliged to sell his own boat, and go on a long voyage over distant seas. There, far away, he was wrecked, and with only two companions was cast upon a solitary island. And when the other two died, he was left there quite alone for more than ten long years, until a ship driven out of its course chanced to touch his island, and so rescued him, and took him home again.

But what did he find there? Before he went he had fitted up a little shop for his wife, but she could not make it answer, and when he did not come back from his long voyage, she had grown poorer and poorer, and was very lonely and wretched. But Philip Ray, who had loved her all the time, was very kind, and sent her children to school and helped as much as he could. And then after those ten long years of waiting, he could bear it no longer, seeing her so sad and lonely. He was certain Enoch must be dead, or he would have come home long ago; and he asked Annie to believe it and become his wife. For another year she waited, but at last consented, and when Enoch really did come back she was married to Philip and was happy in her new home. That was what Enoch found when he came back, a broken man, but true and brave and loving as ever.

He would not tell them who he was, and that he was still alive, for that would have been too terrible for Annie as she then was. One evening after dark he looked in through their window into the lighted room and saw the happy family, and the new baby on Philip's knee; and he was content to know that she was happy. He hid himself from them, and would not let them see his misery. It was terrible to bear, and this is how he prayed for strength:—

"O God Almighty, blessed Saviour, Thou That did'st uphold me on my lonely isle, Uphold me, Father, in my loneliness A little longer! Aid me, give me strength Not to tell her, never to let her know. Help me not to break in upon her peace."

So he went back into the village, and found some humble work to do, and told no one. Only when, soon after, his strength failed, and he knew he was dying, did he tell the woman who tended him, and sent messages of love and blessing to his wife and the children, and to Philip, too, for "he never meant us anything but good." But they were only to be told after he was dead. So perfectly in his great unselfishness did he love them to the end, and bravely kept his vow, "not to break in upon her peace."

MISSIONARY ZEAL.

THE autumn meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, here reported, furnish abundant evidence of the stirrings of earnest religious life seeking for new channels of enlarged activity. Much was heard of the great surprise of the Unitarian Van Mission during the past summer, in the discovery that so many of our men could speak effectively to the people on their own ground, man to man, apart from any conventional church surroundings, and, at the same time, that the response was so eager. It is manifest that large numbers of the people are keenly interested and hungering for a new interpretation of religious truth and the Christian Gospel, in harmony with actual knowledge, both in the realm of natural science and of human history, answering to what is most universal and noblest in the ideal aspirations of mankind. And we, as Unitarians, facing this very genuine need, find that we have a message to deliver, and that when rightly delivered in the true spirit of human sympathy it goes home. Two great gifts we have to offer—the word of positive religious testimony, of what we find in the experience of our own life to be the highest and most helpful truth, and the demonstration of the true principles of a progressive religious life. The letter of Dr. Tudor Jones, from Wellington, New Zealand, furnishes us with a striking example of the first; the opening of the new church for the Rev. W. Rosling and his congregation at Bradford, is a no less striking illustration of the second. Preaching at the opening of that church the Rev. C. J. Street made the clearest declaration that though they had called it a Unitarian Church, it was in fact, and must always remain, a Free Church. Whether a genuinely Free Church is rightly called a Unitarian Church, we do not at the moment discuss. Certainly it is a fact that Unitarians, unless they would be false to what is noblest in their own history, must found only free churches and maintain a genuinely open religious fellowship. Our missionary zeal cannot be too earnest, so long as it is concerned not with words about religion, but with religion itself, and neither by word nor deed does any injury to that freedom of the spirit, to which our faith owes its life, and in which it must ever find its highest calling of God.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMN MEETINGS.

THE autumn meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and of the Sunday School Association were held at Leeds and Bradford on Friday and Saturday, October 19 and 20. Five years ago similar meetings were held in Leeds, and the year before at Sheffield. Other recent meetings were Newcastle, 1902; and Manchester, 1903. In the last two years, for one reason or another, no autumn meeting of the associations was held.

The opening of the new iron church at West Bowling, Bradford, for the Rev. W. Rosling and his congregation, was happily celebrated in connection with these meetings; and while, owing to this and other circumstances, the preparations had to be somewhat hurriedly completed, and the attendance at Leeds was not as large as it otherwise might have been, and as it was five years ago, the most generous and hospitable arrangements had been made to give the visitors a hearty Yorkshire welcome, and the proceedings throughout were eminently successful and full of promise for the future of that progressive work to which the Associations and the Yorkshire Unitarian Union alike are pledged.

The first meeting was a private conference of ministers in the Mill Hill Schools at Leeds, on the Friday afternoon, arranged by the "Ministerial Fellowship," of which the Rev. C. J. Street is secretary. The Rev. Dendy Agate presided, in the absence of Dr. Carpenter, the president.

Tea in the schoolroom was followed by a reception in the Priestley Hall, and then the company proceeded to the theatre of the Philosophical Society, where the public meeting was held. There was a good attendance, and the speakers, from the chairman onwards, kept with quite remarkable exactness to the time allotted to each upon the programme.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

Sir JAMES KITSON, Bart., M.P., who presided, offered a very cordial welcome to the Association, and as chairman of the trustees of Mill Hill Chapel, spoke of the pleasure that visit afforded to the members of their congregation. Theirs, he reminded the meeting, was one of the oldest Non-conformist congregations in that city and in the West Riding. In Mill Hill Chapel distinguished ministers had led them in worship of God, the Father, and in discipleship to Jesus Christ, and he recalled especially the names of Priestley, Hutton, Wicksteed, Hincks, Carpenter, and of Hargrove, still happily with them, active and useful, as acceptable as ever. They, as a congregation, had been bound together through that long period, rejoicing in the fact that they were not held by any creed, or by any necessity of refusing to accept truth as it might be revealed to them by science and literary investigation, but were free to follow the guidance of truth in the future as in the past. In welcoming that Association they received a society based on those principles, and they were bound to do their utmost to see that it was strengthened in its efforts to secure freedom of thought and action in the future: They were the more bound to this because they were not a great body. The Association had an income of some £8,000 a year, and was pretty sure to expend it in the way they desired—in missionary enterprise throughout the country and in a wider field. Quite recently its work had had useful and far-reaching effects: The Association was doing a great service, and he hoped it would go forward. His concluding word was of hearty welcome.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, of Sheffield, had for his subject, "What do Unitarians stand for to-day?" Unitarian, he said, was to his mind the noblest of names. It was, at any rate, affirmative, making one grand and glorious affirmation, which included much more than appeared on the surface. It was the affirmation not simply of the unipersonality of the Godhead, but of the unity of God, the sublimest of all truths, which had stood the test of history, and was confirmed by the teachings of science. The same truth was set forth by fearless thinkers in matters of theology, declaring a unity of purpose in God through all the ages. Whatever men had thought, God had remained the same; His will was always done, and would be to the end of time. So they came to the thought of one holy Church of God throughout the world, the church of all faithful men and women who strove to worship in spirit and in truth. God had spoken through many teachers in many ways and in all ages: Wherever there had been aspiration after the Eternal, and the heart had gone forth in worship and in service, there had been membership of the Church of God. They stood also for the unity of man: Divine Fatherhood was not a limited truth. In certain quarters men believed in the Father simply as the Father of Jesus Christ: No one was prouder of the personality of Jesus than Unitarians, no one got more inspiration from the heroism, self-sacrifice, truthfulness of his life. They acknowledged him as Son of God, but as differing only in degree, not in essence, from other men. There they had an example of what humanity at its best might be, and others in the same way might realise the ideal. The Unitarian had not only a God to worship, but an ideal man, that he might be led still nearer to the heavenly Father. He looked to Jesus as the pre-eminent son of God, but every man was a son of God, emanating from the Father. The Father's love was for every human being. The doctrine of the divine Fatherhood must embrace the whole human family, and the unity of man involved also human brotherhood—an assertion lightly made, of which the depth and reality were not always perceived. It involved a duty difficult to carry out, and they were only beginning to realise its obligations, in the love they owed to the whole human race. Jesus understood it, and his followers tried to, but none of them did so to perfection. Their name stood also for unity between God and man, one in aim and spirit, so that they were called upon to be fellow-labourers with God. And that was an undying relationship. If they had an element of God in their souls it was indestructible, and so they stood for the immortal hope and faith in the eternity of human life. Then they must have also the necessary atmosphere of freedom. They could not breathe without it. Only so could truth convey its message to men. That freedom they would maintain with their heart's blood, but they valued the freedom not for its own sake, but for what it brought, for the opportunity it gave to find the truth and set it forth. Unitarianism had always been progressive, and always must be. With open mind, ready for truth from every quarter, it took care that its trust-deeds should be open also. They would not be less faithful to their freedom than their fathers who were not Unitarians; they were, above all, determined that the freedom should be handed down to those who came after them, that they should have the same opportunity of finding their way to the truth.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS spoke on "Truth-seeking and Truth-speaking in Religion," and referred to the history of their congregations, of which Mill Hill was so noble an example, as showing how the determination to be true had made them what they were, and had shown that the way of freedom was the only way for absolute sincerity and veracity in religion. They were thankful for the happy fellowship of religious life in their free churches, in which they offered a welcome to all who were driven out from other folds. They were not so conceited as to suppose that they were the only truth seekers. Both among the broad-minded clergy of the Church and among other Nonconformists there were leaders of religious thought, to whom they were greatly indebted, but in a creed-bound church those men seemed to be in a false position. For their own part they had to demonstrate that in freedom was the only true principle, and they must hope that it would be recognised in other churches also. It was for them to show that in that open fellowship there was the power of living religion. Recognising how the knowledge of religious truth must grow, it was given to them to feel that in such service God was with them, and was leading them in the true way of life.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, whose subject was "Some Things Unitarians might do," said that they did not give half enough chance to the women of their churches to show what they could do. It was not enough to let them take the lead in bazaars and tea parties. They were in a majority, and were moved by intense religious earnestness, and they ought to have more power in the forefront of the churches. He urged members of the congregations generally to be less reserved and help in the welcoming of newcomers, and encourage others to come in. There was much friendly work they might do in a true brotherly and sisterly spirit. Social gatherings should be social not only in name, but in fact. They should mingle together and not simply with their own set. He told of what they were doing in the East Cheshire Union in the way of united meetings and services, making for revival in their churches. The meetings were giving them new strength and warmth of brotherly feeling. Unitarians were called cold, but it was a burning shame if they were so. They must be knit together in new life and strength by such means as he had indicated. He urged upon them the duty of bringing their sons and daughters into the life of the church, and not suffer them to be drawn away from the Sunday worship. He earnestly pleaded that the best of their young men should be led to enter their colleges and give themselves to the ministry of religion.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, speaking on "Religion and the Democracy," said that subject could never be foreign to a Unitarian gathering. It was essential in the interest of the democratic movement of the day and of religion, that they should understand each other. They must judge generously and sympathetically the great movement going on in their midst. Nothing was more obvious than the fact that the great democratic movement of the day was largely alienated from the ordinary public worship, but he knew little of the movement who imagined that the spirit of worship and reverence was absent from it. It was ever inspired with that which was essential to and of the very heart of religion. He looked with gratitude to the Labour movement of to-day, which in the higher hopes and nobler purposes for which it was calling men to live, gave them a nobler alternative to that short and easy escape from the consciousness of misery and difficulty which the licensing customs held out at every corner. It was infinitely better that men should be honestly seeking to find a way of improving their condition and that of their fellows than that in despair they should surrender to dangerous and degrading indulgences. The democratic movement had a special message for them, and had a special claim on their sympathy. They refused to regard the world as a wilderness through which they had to go as quickly as they could, scarred as little as might be; they had learnt to rejoice in the beautiful order of that world as the creation of God; and the democratic movement refused to accept wrong conditions as inevitable. It was essentially a good world, and their aim must be to perfect the conditions. The men of the democratic movement appealed to those who believed in a good God to sympathise with their fight for a higher ideal. If authority in religion was no longer to be sought in book or church, but in the conscience and heart of their own manhood, must not those instincts and hopes of theirs command sympathy? What then had they, for their part, to say to the democracy? They were bound by all their traditions to sympathise with that great movement, but to escape disappointment and the new tyranny of a low materialism there must be the inspiration of idealism. There must be the wider horizon of the thought of religion, pointing in the one direction in which true satisfaction of the heart-hunger of mankind could be found. How could inspiration be found apart from the central thought of religion, that not in riches, but in a simple, beautiful life of purity and truth, of brotherhood and humble grateful love to God could the highest life be found? There was no justification for the democratic position without the fundamental teaching of the universal Fatherhood and love of God and a true brotherhood of men. They exaggerated the alienation of the democracy from religion; the alienation was only from the old forms of religion. The Van Mission had proved the people to be hungering for the new life of the Gospel they could give. But the message must be definite. The old test held good: "The God that answers by fire, let him be God." It was the men who were ready to sacrifice themselves for a cause who carried conviction to the people. It was for them to show that their message was the power of God in their own hearts and lives.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE spoke of "Our Opportunity for Practical Work," and said that they must show the reality of their religion by the way in which they helped to bear the burdens of the world. They must offer the welcome of a religious home to those who wanted it, and show that they had help to give. To the earnest and devoted heart there was always abundance of opportunity; it was only the inward consecration that was sometimes lacking. There were resources of spiritual strength from which faithful souls could always draw. If they would rouse themselves to their great opportunities, in them also the springs of the diviner life would be deep and clear and strong.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, as President of the Association, spoke of its aims and work. The Association, he said, gave assistance to churches. They tried to help the weak churches, and they looked to the strong churches to help them in that work. They maintained the principle of freedom, and offered fellowship and help to churches in other lands also, though they were not Unitarian churches, and sometimes not even Christian, but all seeking the best and highest. In helping such they were doing God's work. It was part of their work, also, to disseminate good and healthy literature, and to furnish lectures by first-class men, to help the people to think, and bring the best of what was spiritual and moral into their life. The creeds they held led to infidelity, but they wanted to bring a genuine Christianity to the people. The old civilisations looked back to a golden age in the far-distant past, but if they would only be Christians in thought and word, in the love of God and man, that golden age would become a possibility in some future time. The Association was indeed growing old, but it worked harder, and was doing more good than ever.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE described the work carried on by the Association at Essex Hall. The work had greatly increased, and correspondence from many distant parts of the world showed how widespread was the interest in religious questions. The Committee tried to promote Unitarianism as representing the highest and best in religion. It was undoubted that they brought light to many struggling souls who had been burdened by superstition. It was not for any small sectarian advantage they did that work, but because there was something in their faith that would make the world better and men and women stronger, and bring them nearer to the mind and heart of the Eternal. It was for that reason that the Association had lived so long and was now stronger than ever in its past history.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE offered final words of welcome to the representatives of the Association. It was good for them to be reminded by that visit that they had not only their own particular church to care about, but belonged to a great cause, represented in almost every country of the world—the cause of human progress and reverent, free religious thought and human welfare, which was the true work of the worshipper of God. They welcomed the Association as a reminder of what they ought to be, as corrector of their despondency, and their helper in every good work.

A cordial vote of thanks to the chairman brought a capital meeting to a close.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Saturday morning a conference was held in the Priestley Hall at Mill Hill, the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, in the chair, when three papers on Unitarian Missionary Work were read.

The Rev. H. BODELL SMITH read the first paper. They, as Unitarians, he said, had something to give which no one else could give—a consistent system of truth, scientific and humane. The Unity of God, as they held it, was a cosmic unity, and it stamped man with divinity. There was no antiquated Unitarianism; it expressed all the unities of life and thought and destiny. It was the gladdest message they could conceive, and they must propagate it. It was a gospel to be declared to their own churches and then to the world outside. To the young they must give clear and definite dogmatic teaching. It was the work of all their Associations, and also of the National Conference, which must be completely Unitarianised. In fact, all their institutions must be Unitarianised more thoroughly and persistently than ever. They had a great opportunity. The ground was ready for their sowing. The world must be made to know what they were. They could only do it under the Unitarian banner. Unitarianism included Christianity and the truest catholicity that had ever been conceived. They must go out to the people and give themselves to open-air preaching. If they had a hundred vans many places would still remain untouched. Where they could not have churches, reading circles should be established. A true life was dependent on true thought. It was foolish to despise doctrine, from which they could not separate religion.

The Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS followed with a thoughtful paper. Unitarians, he said, must desire to influence others to accept their views of God and man and the universe, and to that end they must maintain their own identity. Even spiritual forces required an organisation through which to work. Concentration was necessary for the diffusion of ideals. Eleven of the thirteen years of his own ministry had been spent at an outpost, far from other churches, and from that experience he said that to establish such a church without means of proper financial support was a grave wrong. It was good to establish an outpost, but without adequate support from the main body of the army it was a forlorn hope. Even in a town of 40,000 inhabitants he held that a Unitarian congregation, where only the working classes come in, could not be made self-supporting. Unless, therefore, the burden of support was largely borne by others, the establishment of such a congregation was indefensible. Church extension should proceed as far as possible from a centre outwards. He doubted the wisdom of diffused efforts. Concentration was the great need. And when a new church was to be established, a first-rate man should be entrusted with the work and adequately supported. To start and to starve a new movement was not good policy. Yet the greatest need of a new effort was not money, but faith. Their organisations ought to find out how to use men and set them to work. They were weary of glorying in freedom; they wanted to glory in their obedience. The Associations should exist not only to do work, but to find it. In church extension one man one pulpit was too expensive; one man two pulpits was found unsatisfactory. He believed, from the experience of Wesleyan neighbours, that two men three pulpits was the ideal they should aim at. In conclusion, he urged greater attention to the doctrinal teaching of their children. Ministers must be teachers also, and they must not neglect the children.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS read the third paper, dealing specially with methods of mission work in Yorkshire. He told of how the paper on "Opportunities and Needs" read at Sheffield in 1900 had borne fruit, and with the new century a new forward movement had begun. Of this the new congregation at Attercliffe, Sheffield, was a witness, and they could now add the new church at West Bowling, Bradford. They were faced by many difficulties, but were not dismayed. The income of their union was too largely absorbed in the support of weak churches, but these could not be abandoned. At Barnsley something was being done, and they had good hope that at Harrogate a congregation might be established. In the Spen Valley the Van Mission had met with a great response. Those who were still held in the meshes of the old orthodoxy, and were living in a sixteenth-century world, needed the enlightenment they could give, and those who were imbued with the new ideas and the modern spirit, and were alienated from the churches, and yet were good men and true, with the interest of their fellow-men at heart, working for social betterment, would be helped by their reasonable gospel. Their opportunity was greater now than ever. While other liberalising influences were also at work, they had their own work to do.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER, who opened the discussion, said that their Unitarianism was a very adaptable thing open to all new truth. The atmosphere of freedom they possessed was something other people hardly realised. If it were true among them that all the Lord's people were prophets, it must be remembered that prophets also had duties, and they must show that they had the dynamics of true religion in their hearts, they must realise the democratic needs of their churches and base their operations on business lines. The Van movement must be advanced. In the eastern counties, for instance, he was convinced that only the Van could save their movement. They must go outside the churches, and he believed they were on the eve of a great awakening, when, with one heart and voice, they would declare for a forward movement.

The Rev. G. A. FERGUSON pleaded for more union in their work.

The Rev. J. RUDDLE said their need was of more intensive rather than extensive cultivation.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., said that, as they had liberty, there must be differences of opinion, and yet people could work together. Organisation, union, they welcomed, but could not have dictation. He was delighted that there was to be a forward movement.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING said he was thankful the Unitarian body had felt the thrill of the Van movement. It persuaded Unitarians that their gospel was worth carrying to the people. The Van's visitors' book contained the names of 883 people, as either Unitarians or seekers after truth. Why should London wait, and not have a Van at once and do its own work?

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN said that his week with the Van was one of the best educative influences of his life. Following on the work of the Van he thought the helpful influence of the Postal Mission ought to be greatly developed. So many people were asking of the Churches: "Who among you all can do us any good?" They ought to do their part.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD quoted the saying of a S. S. Union lecturer: "What you want to keep give away," and applied it to the Van preachers, who, in giving their message, strengthened themselves and realised their message more than ever.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON said there was reason for Unitarians to be in very good spirits. The Hibbert Journal, that great symposium of liberal thought, was a most hopeful sign of the times, but they must also go to the people, and in a more unconventional way than had been their wont. He honoured the noble enthusiasm of the young men of the Van Mission, and if they would have an old fellow, he would like to have a try at that work.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, referring to the little old congregations, said they must be maintained, and told of what had been done in North and East Lancashire to promote independence funds for such churches. In their new work, where a church could not be established, they ought at least to form groups of those who had responded to their message, and with the help of lay-preachers keep in touch with them.

A vote of thanks to the readers of the papers, moved by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and seconded by the Rev. John Fox, brought the conference to a close.

Members went on by the one-o'clock train to Bradford, where they were most hospitably entertained at luncheon at the Great Northern Hotel by the President and Mr. Henry Lupton, President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, prior to the opening of the West Bowling Church.

BRADFORD MEETINGS.

OPENING OF A NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH.

THE iron church which has been erected in Broadway-avenue, West Bowling, about two miles from the centre of Bradford, for the Rev. W. Rosling and his congregation, is a monument of the energy and prompt action of the Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, of which Mr. Henry Lupton is chairman. Mr. Rosling, it will be remembered, seceded early in the present year from the Ryan-street Congregational Church with a considerable number of his old congregation, and services have since been held in hired halls; but it had become imperative that before the winter set in the new congregation should have a home of its own. Eight weeks ago the Committee of the Union decided that they would have to build, and it was actually only a fortnight and a day before the opening that the land had been bought and operations begun. The land cost £250, and the whole of the cost was estimated at a little over £1,300. The church is admirably adapted for its purpose, and the interior is light, and of pleasant aspect. It will seat 250 comfortably, and on either side of the platform end is a class-room, divided off by a movable partition, so that the whole can be thrown into one, and accommodation for another hundred or more of congregation added.

The church was opened on Saturday afternoon by Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., who was accompanied by Lady Durning Lawrence. There was a large gathering of friends, who quickly filled the building, after Sir Edwin, having received a golden key from the architect, unlocked the door and declared the church open. To the congregation assembled inside he then gave a brief address, which was followed by a service of dedication, conducted by the Rev. W. Rosling.

The opening hymn was Robert Collyer's "Unto thy temple, Lord, we come," and the Lessons 1 Kings viii. 14, ff., and Ephes. iv. A quartette of male voices from the Chapel-lane choir sang very beautifully the anthem, "God is a Spirit," and the whole choir afterwards another anthem of praise. T. H. Gill's "We come unto our fathers' God" was the hymn before the sermon, which was preached by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield.

Psalm cxviii. 24 was the text, "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will be glad and rejoice in it," and the preacher congratulated the new congregation on their emancipation into spiritual freedom. It had been with them no matter of sudden conversion, but of gradual development from within. They had found in their old connection with organised Congregationalism something in which their spiritual life was not free to grow; therefore they had changed, not their convictions, but the setting of their religious life. It was painful to break with old associations. No man deliberately chose the way of thorns, but only under divine guidance. They felt that they must have truth and the whole truth, in freedom of the spirit. They must not be afraid of the isolation that step would bring; it was the price every Unitarian had to pay for his honesty. They had named their new church Unitarian. Yet it was a free church in the fullest significance of the term. They who had known what it was to be bound by the fetters of an old creed would not forge fresh fetters. There were no doctrinal limitations in their trust deed. Their church was dedicated simply for the worship and service of God, to no half truth, but to worship in spirit and in truth.

The closing hymn was "Forward be our watchword." The collection amounted to £19 10s. It was announced that the services on Sunday would be conducted by the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones and Charles Hargrove.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE.

After the service, the visitors and other Bradford friends returned to Chapel-lane Chapel, where tea was provided in the school-room, and a Conference arranged by the Sunday School Association was held.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., the President, took the chair, and, after his opening address, Mr. Ion Pritchard, the hon. secretary, made a statement as to the work of the Association. Among the suggestions made by various speakers, the need for simple statements for doctrinal teaching was emphasised. The Rev. DENDY AGATE gave an address on "The New Era in Sunday-school Teaching," in the course of which he quoted some wise words from Sir Joshua Fitch's lectures to teachers on the ideal school, which must have not only good order and good teaching, but a high purpose, the spirit of work, a solemn sense of duty, and love of truth. He also referred his hearers to Professor Peake's book on "Reform in Sunday-school Teaching."

In a brief discussion which followed, Mrs. CEREDIG JONES dwelt upon the need of a more earnest cultivation of character and attention to direct moral training, and Mr. E. O. DODGSON, President of the Yorkshire S.S. Union, Mr. WIGLEY, of the Manchester district, the Revs. W. ROSLING and J. J. WRIGHT also spoke. Mr. Wright urged that ministers ought to be better trained as teachers, and ought themselves to give more attention to the training of the children and young people of school and congregation.

PUBLIC MEETING AT WEST BOWLING.

Later in the evening a public meeting was held in the new Unitarian church at West Bowling, opened with the hymn, "Faith of our fathers, living still."

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, President of the B. & F. Unitarian Association, was in the chair, and congratulated the congregation on the opening of their church. He reminded them of an old saying quoted by Dr. Carpenter in his opening address at Manchester College, "Enter here good, leave it better," as a good inscription for a place of worship. Their religion aimed at higher thoughts, better life, and the making of better citizens. For that reason they came into the church. He congratulated all who had any part in that day's proceedings.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN spoke of the mission and message of Unitarianism as a natural outgrowth from the Christian Church and its religion. The whole of Christian history belonged to them as much as to others; and in their progressive movement they held that all truth was one and of God, and thus were pledged to the great principles of truth, liberty, progress, and humanity in religion. The Van had shown, not only that men and women were hungering for their message, but that they had men to deliver it.

Sir EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE spoke of Christianity and character, declaring that the main purpose of our human life and the main purpose of Christianity was the formation of character, and that this was the object of Unitarianism. In Christ's parable of the Judgment the question asked was what had you done, not what had you believed. "I was naked and ye clothed me. I was sick and in prison and ye visited me," &c., &c. An effort seemed to be made at the present day to emphasise the importance of Ritual, almost as it were to substitute Ritual for righteousness. But any ceremonial which was supposed to be a substitute for character was demoralising, and Unitarians said that no ceremonial was in itself pleasing to Almighty God. There was no merit in going to church two or three times a day, no merit in observing the sacraments, excepting so far as these assisted in the formation of character, and he sometimes wondered whether those who so persistently followed the supreme importance of sacraments and Ritualistic observances were aware that nearly all of these ceremonies on which they placed so much value were derived not from Christian but from Pagan practices.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., spoke on the teaching of religion, which, he said, must be something more than instruction, the putting into a child's mind catechism or forms of doctrine, it must be education, a drawing out and developing of the natural religiousness of the child. It was a mistake prematurely to force other people's opinions on the child.

Mrs. CEREDIG JONES urged the congregation in their new church to dwell upon the underlying truths common to all churches. It was a much more important fact that they were dedicating a new church to the worship and service of God than that they were opening a new Unitarian chapel. It was her trust that there truth and righteousness would be preached. Though that opening was a grand consummation of their hopes, and as worshippers they would feel what a splendid opportunity they now had, it was in reality only a beginning. The new building was only a foundation, the living church had still to be raised. It depended not on their minister alone, but on every one of them, on the children too, to make that a living church. It might be a noble influence in the neighbourhood, and minister to the needs of those about them. A church no more than an individual could live to itself alone. She urged them to go forth in faith, to give, hoping for nothing in return, to gather in the children, to do their share in the redemption of the world, and they need not fear for want of support; their efforts would be surely blessed.

The Rev. W. ROSLING expressed his profound gratitude to the many people and for the many influences which had led up to the building of that church. It had been the most wonderful year of his life. Only on the first Sunday of February he and the members of that church had found themselves homeless, and he had felt very keenly not so much his own position as that of those who had followed him out. But light very soon began to break, thanks, a thousand times, to Mr. Ceredig Jones; and they were helped on to a new platform. They did not know what to call themselves, and he did not much care; but they could not go back to orthodoxy. They had not taken that step lightly, and now they must prove themselves worthy of the faith reposed in them. They must go forward, and do the work of God, who had led them so far. He would lead them on, and help them to do that work to which they were called. To all those friends who had helped them, he and his people said, "Thank you all a thousand times!"

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said he was delighted to be there that night, instead of in the room in which he had preached to them some months ago. He had been satisfied then that they were in downright earnest, and his Association had been glad to help them in every possible way. He was thankful that he had found in them none of that bitterness towards their old friends and associates which sometimes unhappily marred a secession movement, and he urged them to make their church in the highest and best sense a parish church in that neighbourhood, so that the people would feel that they cared for their highest welfare. It would not be a Unitarian church if it neglected its duty to the world around. The Association wanted to promote Unitarianism, because it helped to build up noble life.

Mr. HENRY LUPTON, who, Mr. Bowie had said, should be known as the "lightning church builder," told of the steps they had taken in getting the church built and ready for that day, and said their success was due quite as much to other members of the committee as to himself. Of the total cost of £1,300 they had after that day's proceedings still £110 to raise, which a promise of a further £10 from a friend in the meeting reduced to £100.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON congratulated the congregation on the tone of their American organ, and proceeded to speak of how ministers and laymen could help one another. Ministers, he said, could help laymen by finding them work to do, and laymen could best help their ministers by regular attendance at the services and by consideration and sympathy.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS made a plea for more co-operation and comradeship in their common work, and the Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES spoke a final word of congratulation and good hope for the future.

Another hymn, and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. W. Rosling, brought the meeting to a close.

A LETTER FROM WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

MANY of the readers of THE INQUIRER will, I feel sure, be glad to receive a few words from me giving an account of the Unitarian movement in Wellington, the chief city of New Zealand. When letters from England arrive five weeks after they are dated, we feel that we are very far away from you, and an INQUIRER six weeks old is read by us with avidity. You are aware that the Unitarian movement was started in Wellington through the visit of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, who was sent out here by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Nearly six months have now passed away since my wife and I came here, and during this time the movement has grown at a pace which is perhaps unknown in the history of Unitarianism. I say this because the chief factor has not been my presence, but the desire of the people to know what Unitarian Christianity is. Here, as in England, and indeed in every European country, large numbers of the people have drifted from the traditional theology, and are as yet outside the churches, because they are unaware of the fact that Christianity can be presented as true to the head as well as to the heart.

It has astonished me to find so many people conscious of the impotence of the traditional theology to meet the demands of the modern mind and spirit. My experience in Wales was that people could get this new knowledge concerning religion in a frank, full way in the Unitarian churches alone. The exceptions are so few in number that they do not count. You will be interested to hear that men and women in Wellington are welcoming our Unitarian gospel as a thing they have been looking for for many years, but which they could not find until now. If half the Unitarians in England had been brought up in the narrow fold of Calvinistic theology they would talk less about the liberalising influence of orthodox churches, and work a little more eagerly for rational Christianity. We have to fight unbelief on the one hand and the traditional theology of the past on the other hand.

If we believe in our own gospel it will not be difficult to get other people to believe in it. In connection with our movement in Wellington, I may say that our services are attended by about 400 people every Sunday evening, and numbers have had to go away for want of room. The morning services are attended by nearly 100 people, and the children's service has grown during the past two months. Parliament is now sitting, and several members, as well as correspondents, attend our services. We have abundant reasons for believing that they carry the good seed all over New Zealand.

We have been preached against from several orthodox pulpits. The subjects announced are as follows:—"The Unitarian Attack on the Gospels," "The Unitarian Christ and the Real Christ," and so forth. You will be astonished to learn that not one of the other ministers has called on me.

Our good work is to go on. It is to mean no less in this distant part of the globe than the planting of the Christianity of Jesus amongst men and women and little children. I owe so much to Unitarian Christianity myself that I am more determined than ever to give my life to this glorious gospel of ours. Here I found peace for my weary soul, and that peace I endeavour to bring to all I come in contact with. Your readers, I am sure, will think of us and wish well to our movement.

I am glad to announce that Mrs. Jones has arranged a Ladies' Working Party which meets weekly with about thirty present, and four sewing machines, in order to prepare for a bazaar to form the nucleus of a building fund. When the time comes we feel confident that our British friends will help us. I regret to say Mrs. Jones has been seriously ill, but I am glad to report that she is now making excellent progress towards recovery.

W. TUDOR JONES.

Sept. 5, 1906.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Tuesday, October 16. The President, the Rev. Joseph Wood, occupied the chair, and 22 other members were present, while apologies were announced from several who were unable to attend.

At the outset the Rev. S. A. Steintal offered on behalf of the Committee a welcome to the President on taking the chair for the first time, and also deep sympathy with him in his bereavement.

The Treasurer, Mr. J. W. Scott, presented statement of accounts, and the result of the recent appeal to the churches to provide the ordinary working expenses of the Conference was stated. As a considerable number had not yet replied, it was resolved that a second copy of the appeal be sent to the minister and secretary of these churches, and that one should also be sent to the secretaries of District Associations.

A cordial invitation from the congregations and ministers of Bolton to hold the next Triennial Conference in that town in the spring of 1909 was accepted with best thanks.

A sub-committee, consisting of the President, Revs. H. E. Dowson, D. Agate, C. J. Street, Dr. W. B. Odgers, K.C., and the Secretary, was appointed to draft a circular with inquiries on the subject of Advisory Committee and Ministerial Settlements Board. The same sub-committee was subsequently appointed to report on the question of preparing a list of ministers.

The question of the supply of students for the ministry was considered à propos of a report by a sub-committee appointed in 1900. The matter could not proceed further at that time, as the Conference had not a secretary who could conduct the correspondence and business entailed by the proposals. The Committee, feeling the urgency of the matter, resolved that this report should be immediately circulated among the members, with a view to immediate action after the next meeting in January.

The President expressed a desire to visit during his term of office as many of our churches as possible—especially the poorer and weaker ones—with the view primarily of kindling their religious life, and also of interesting them in the Conference and in the matters which the Conference has taken up, e.g., the Guild movement, social service, and the recruiting of the ministry. With the approval and sympathy of his congregation he was prepared to devote a week or ten days to visiting each of six districts. On the motion of Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by Rev. J. C. Street, it was resolved: "That, having heard the statement of the President on the question of Local Conferences and the visitation of the Churches, the Committee approves of the proposal generally, and gratefully accepts the offer of the President to conduct six series of meetings in the year 1907, to be carried on, as far as possible, in co-operation with the local associations, and authorises the Secretary to make the necessary communications."

The next meeting of the Committee will be held in Manchester in January, on the same day as the annual meeting of Manchester College.

MEMORIAL AT BATH.

At the morning service last Sunday, in Trim-street Chapel, Bath, the senior member for the city, Mr. Donald Maclean, M.P., unveiled a large memorial brass to five Mayors of Bath (representing 14 Mayoralties in the last 40 years of the 19th century) who worshipped at that chapel. The inscription is as follows:—

IN MEMORIAM.

"This Memorial was erected by the Congregation of Trim-street Chapel in grateful and affectionate remembrance of the unselfish devotion to civic duty of five fellow-worshippers who in recent years have held the office of Mayor and Chief Magistrate of the city.

Alderman Sir JEROM MURCH, Kt., J.P., D.L.

Born 29 October, 1807. Died 13 May, 1895.

Minister of this Chapel 1833 to 1846.

Seven times Mayor of this City.

Alderman THOMAS JOLLY.

Born 20 September, 1801. Died 18 October, 1889.

Twice Mayor of this City.

Councillor HANDEL COSSHAM, J.P., M.P.
Born 31 March, 1824. Died 23 April, 1890.

Twice Mayor of this City.

Alderman WILLIAM CRUCKNELL
JOLLY, J.P.

Born 16 September, 1826. Died
22 January, 1904.

Mayor of this City.

Alderman JOHN RICKETTS, J.P.

Born 5 December, 1837. Died 13 July, 1899.

Mayor of this City.

"As members of the City Council they rendered distinguished service, devoting both time and ability to municipal affairs, and in connection with various other public bodies served well the cause of philanthropy and progress."

In the course of a brief address Mr. Maclean said that, although the names were written in brass before them, he was sure they were even more deeply engraved in the fleshy tablets of the hearts of the citizens who recollected their services.

Civic service was one which was rendered not only to their brethren, but to God the Father, whom they acknowledged, and these men, whose memory they commemorated there that day, had passed through the gates of a rich usefulness, as he liked to think, to another service in another city, where everything was as it should be, and which was a copy to them of what they should strive to make their communal life here below. Their communal life should be a truly religious life, for all true service ranked equal with God.

The service was conducted by the Rev. J. McDowell, and, after the unveiling, the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers preached a memorial sermon, of which we hope to give some report next week. In the evening the Rev. A. N. Blatchford gave the first of a series of special lectures, his subject being "A Real Free Church." The Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, L. P. Jicks, J. Harwood, J. C. Street, and J. Page Hopps are to give the other lectures of the course.

A TEMPERANCE SPEECH.

MR. FRED MADDISON, M.P., was the chief speaker at a meeting in the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, organised by the National Unitarian Temperance Association and the London Auxiliary U.K. Alliance, on Friday evening, October 19.

In the course of his speech, Mr. Maddison said that from the personal standpoint he was on solid ground. Total abstinence need never be apologised for; teetotallers were not martyrs; they had made no sacrifice; they had a good thing, and they wanted to share it. In times past, as a newspaper compositor, he had worked under bad conditions but had stood the strain and stress better than his mates who had indulged in alcohol. He did not place a too great reliance on legislative efforts. If he could influence one man to sign the pledge he would do more real good than by his vote in Parliament. Individuals were the backbone of all reform movements. Only as a Temperance atmosphere was created in the constituencies could legislation be possible. He was a convinced believer in the old-fashioned method of individual, personal abstinence. Health required no intoxicants; conviviality and enjoyment required none; men were happy and healthy without them. Teetotallers were not "kill-joys"—they wanted to raise the national ideals. They wanted the money spent in drink expended on something else—books, pictures, furniture, clothing, &c. They wanted men to be discontented with the conditions of their lives. The drinker and the drunkard retarded social progress and lowered the national ideals. A total abstainer was a better citizen, a better soldier in the army of progress, a better father, a better unit of the community of the world. From an economic point of view, drinking was bad. No man gives less to labour than he who drinks most. Expenditure on alcohol meant less for labour than expenditure on other things. Board of Trade returns contained no sentiment, and they taught him that the brewing trade only paid 7 per cent. of its receipts in wages for labour. Parliament looked upon the Temperance Question, as on all questions, in the broadest possible way. In the words of the Royal Commission Report, the drink trade had "degraded the nation." Except for that Parliament would not interfere at all. "It would result in national degradation"—therefore it was a national question and Parliament must interfere.

Parliament had promised a Bill for next Session to cope with this gigantic evil, and a quarrel had arisen in the Temperance ranks over its suggested clauses. The idea particularly objected to was called "Disinterested Management," and some very unfair things had been said. He was not concerned as to whether a licence was held under present conditions or under any scheme of management proposals so long as the public had the control and option of refusal. He had seen the suggested proposals of the measure about to be introduced, and he could say that they included a restoration of the powers formerly held by the justices, a time limit, and other things the Temperance party had been praying for. And the supreme control of licences was to be placed in the hands of the people. If the people are endowed with this power, he thought all other details might safely be left.

The meeting, over which the Rev. F. Allen presided, was well attended. Selections of music were rendered by the orchestra before the proceedings began, and during the evening solos were sung by several friends, and part songs by an augmented choir of the Stamford-street Temperance Society.

UNITARIAN WORK IN SCOTLAND.

A CONFERENCE of ministers and delegates of Unitarian Churches in Scotland was held at St. Vincent-street, Glasgow, on Monday, Oct. 22. Each of the churches was represented by the minister and one lay delegate, the Scottish Unitarian Association by Mr. J. G. Davidson, and the McQuaker Trustees by Rev. James Harwood, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Brief reports of the Churches at Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow (St. Vincent-street and Ross-street), Kilmarnock, and Kirkcaldy were submitted by the representatives. Among the topics considered at the Conference were the following:—The interchange of pulpits among ministers, special services and lectures, missionary methods in reaching the people, the circulation of books and tracts, the provision of a Unitarian Van for work in the towns and villages of Scotland.

The Conference was organised by the McQuaker Trustees, who are entrusted with the duty of assisting and maintaining and diffusing the principles of Unitarian Christianity in Scotland. The Rev. James Harwood, chairman of the Scottish Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, presided, and the following took part in the proceedings:—Revs. R. B. Drummond, James Forrest, E T. Russell, Charles Sneddon, Alex. Webster, Henry Williamson, Dr. John Barlow, Messrs. J. G. Davidson, W. Horton, W. Kirkhope, W. F. McRobb, Peter Munro, J. Smeaton, Miss M. D. Strachan, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and Mr. Ion Pritchard.

The chairman said that the various practical proposals would receive the careful attention of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and it was hoped that as a result of the Conference more "Forward Movement" work would be undertaken by Unitarians in Scotland. It transpired that the committee of the Scottish Unitarian Association had resolved to dispose of the Clerk's-lane Church, Kilmarnock. Rev. W. Wilson had resigned the ministry there, and is now studying at Manchester College, Oxford. The present church, formerly orthodox, has seating accommodation for 650, it is situated in a very unsuitable locality, and it is in need of extensive and costly repairs. It is thought that it may be possible to sell the property, to pay off the mortgage, and to make a substantial contribution towards the erection of a building in another part of the town where the present small congregation could meet together for worship, and where there will be room for growth. At a meeting held at Kilmarnock on Saturday, October 20, thirty adults expressed a strong desire for the continuance of the services. The McQuaker Trustees have arranged for pulpit supplies for a brief period pending developments. The future of the movement will largely depend upon the earnestness and devotion of the Unitarians of Kilmarnock.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—The anniversary services in connection with the Sunday-schools and Home Mission were held on Sunday, Oct. 14, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who referred to the fact that in that church was his first ministerial charge 43 years ago. There were large congregations, among those present being quite a number of friends still attached to the church who were there when Mr. Dowson first came. The annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Sunday-schools and Home Mission was held on the following evening, Oct. 15, the chair being taken by Councillor Hy. J. Sayer, the Lord Mayor elect. Reports of the work being done in the Sunday-schools were read by Miss Prime, the morning superintendent of the girls' school, and Mr. John Chamberlain, the morning superintendent of the boys school. The hon. treasurer, Mr. T. W. Ryland, after reading his statement of accounts for the year, made the pleasing announcement that a legacy amounting to about £400 had been left to the Sunday-schools. The Home Missionary, Mr. W. J. B. Tranter, read his annual report of the work accomplished by the mission during the year, and in reply to his question, "Had the mission justified its existence?" cited the case of a family of five persons helped to Canada (one of whom was present in the meeting), all of whom had done well, the three boys owning their own farms of 300 acres, and the two girls being well married. It was very gratifying to the officers to see so many past workers in the Sunday-schools. There were about two or three hundred persons present.

Bury St. Edmunds (Appointment).—The Rev. J. M. Connell has been appointed minister of Churchgate-street Chapel, and will begin his work there on Sunday, Nov. 4.

Exeter.—The first autumn lecture under the auspices of George's Guild was given on the 16th inst. by Mr. C. J. Tait, F.R.I.B.A., on "Donatello, Andrea del Sarto, and Michelangelo." A crowded audience listened attentively for an hour and a half to an exposition of the ideals and life-work of the trio of unforgettable Florentines, which was illustrated by a number of exquisite lantern slides. The chair was taken by Mr. Wm. Payne. The Guild, of which the Rev. T. W. Chignell is president, has arranged a varied programme of monthly lectures throughout the winter.

Halifax.—The annual choir services at Northgate-end Chapel was conducted on Sunday by the Rev. J. Hanson Green, of Lydgate. There was special music by the choir and other friends under the direction of Mr. A. Wilson. The collection was £4 14s. 2½d.

Harvest Services.—We have further reports of harvest thanksgiving services at Belfast, First Church (Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, October 14, with Sunday-school services); Blackpool, South Shore (Rev. J. E. Manning, October 21); Malton (Rev. J. S. Mathers, October 14, followed by Monday evening lecture on "Ruskin and Social Reform," by the Rev. John Ellis).

Hinkley.—On Wednesday week the Rev. W. G. Tarrant lectured on the Bible to an appreciative audience of about 200. This was the first of a series of four Wednesday lectures, in which the Revs. J. Page Hopps, W. Copeland Bowie, and J. C. Street are also taking part.

Liverpool: Garston (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting was held on Monday, October 22, in the iron chapel, St. Mary's-road, to welcome Mr. Douglas Hoole, as minister. Alderman Bowring presided, supported by Revs. J. C. Odgers, H. D. Roberts, J. C. Hirst, T. Cole (Congregational), and R. F. Whiteside (Primitive Methodist). The Revs. R. P. Farley, H. W. Hawkes, C. Craddock were also present. Mr. Bowring welcomed Mr. Hoole on behalf of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and was followed by the Revs. J. C. Odgers, H. D. Roberts and J. C. Hirst, Mr. Watson and Mr. Boyle, who welcomed Mr. Hoole into the fellowship of the Liverpool ministry. The Rev. Thomas Cole spoke feelingly of the assistance received in his student days from Dr. Vance Smith, and of the valuable writings of Dr. Channing and Dr. Martineau. He assured Mr. Hoole that no theological differences should impair their friendly co-operation. Mr. R. F. Whiteside, while regretting the departure of Mr. Hoole from the Primitive Methodist denomination, believed him to be a man of sincere conviction, and wished him success in his new mission at Garston. Mr. Hoole, who was very cordially received, thanked the meeting for its kindly expressions of friendship to himself, and assured his hearers that his feelings were too large for adequate expression. He had been but three weeks with them, and already they had cheered him with their earnestness and devotion. The meeting, in the course of which the Gateacre Chapel choir sang three anthems, closed with the Doxology.

London: Islington.—The bazaar in aid of the funds of the Unity Church Preston Memorial Building, was held at Myddelton Hall on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Oct. 18-20. Lady Durning-Lawrence was the opener on the first day, when the chair was occupied by Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, and on the platform were Miss Preston, Mrs. W. Wooding, Miss Mildred Bartram (hon. sec. of the bazaar), the Revs. E. Savell Hicks and Henry Gow, Mr. Alfred Wilson, and Mr. F. Leyden Sargent (treasurer and secretary of Unity Church). It was a matter for congratulation that Mr. Stanton W. Preston was also present. The chairman in his opening address expressed the great pleasure it gave him to be there, and he referred to his long friendship with the late Mr. Joseph T. Preston and the family, and the close connection of his own circle with Unity Church. He wished that when the site for the church was acquired his brother (the late Sir J. C. Lawrence), as treasurer, could have seen his way to the purchase of all the vacant land then unoccupied by houses and owned by a florist; but now the ground was built over and its acquisition impossible. The extension of the school buildings was necessary, and had been entered upon, and must be seen through to the end; As the last of the elder Lawrences, he felt it a great pleasure to do all he could to forward the memorial. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks, in the course of his remarks, mentioned that at the outset he went to Sir Edwin for advice upon the scheme, and was very glad that it met with his approval, which was shown by his heading the subscription list with £100. The Rev. Henry Gow and other speakers urged the cause of the bazaar and memorial fund. On Friday, the opener was Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, and on Saturday, Mrs. Hahnemann Epps; the chairmen for the two days being, respectively, Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Harold Wade. The supporters were Mrs. Wallace Bruce, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. S. T. Johnson, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor. The sum realised by the bazaar amounted to nearly £300, which was considered satisfactory, although considerably below the £500 hoped for. The report of the bazaar would not be complete without mention being made of three presentations that took place. On Saturday, Mrs. Hahnemann Epps, on behalf of several friends of the Church, presented the Rev. E. Savell Hicks with a framed photographic enlargement from a Bolton portrait of himself, which had presided, during the bazaar, over the Art Stall. On Saturday evening, Mr. Hicks, on behalf of some Church friends, begged Miss Mildred Bartram's acceptance of a framed proof engraving, after McWhirter. Both pictures were grateful recognitions of indefatigable services rendered by the president and secretary of the bazaar. A domestic touch was given to Friday's proceedings, when Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, on behalf of the subscribers, charmingly presented Baby Hicks with a handsome rocking-horse, from one of the stalls. Upon his being placed in the saddle, Miss Alice Odgers, who was attending as Quick-Sketch Artist, made a rapid drawing of baby and steed to the delight of his parents. Throughout the bazaar a cheerful and kindly spirit prevailed, increased by the generous and practical interest shown by friends from neighbouring churches, which augurs well for the future prosperity of the church.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Oldham on Saturday, October 20, and was attended by about 130 persons. The committee met in the afternoon to transact necessary business, the retiring president, Mrs. Dowson, presiding. After tea, the meeting was held in the large schoolroom. The president for the ensuing year, Rev. B. C. Constable, occupied the chair, and delivered a presidential address. The minutes of the last annual meeting were read and confirmed and the reports of the treasurer and hon. secretary were read and adopted. The report of the treasurer showed an increased balance in hand. The report of the secretary was more interesting than usual, as it marked the completion of 20 years' service in that capacity, and the meeting passed a special resolution congratulating him on the fact and thanking him for the generous and devoted way in which he had served the Union for 20 years. Miss Dorman was elected vice-president of the Union and Messrs. F. Hepworth and A. Slater were re-elected treasurer and hon. secretary respectively. A resolution of regret at the recent death of Rev. H. Kelsey White was passed, with one of sympathy with Rev. W. F. Turland in his serious illness. Rev. W. Harrison introduced for discussion, "Shall the Union arrange for examinations in our Schools?" A good discussion followed, the result being that five of the schools expressed their willingness to again co-operate in an examination scheme. Hearty votes of thanks were accorded to the opener, to the Oldham friends for their arrangements, and to the president. Among the other ministers present were Revs. H. E. Dowson, J. A. Pearson, A. R. Andrea, H. Bodell Smith, W. G. Price, J. E. Stead, E. Gwilym Evans, and H. E. Perry. Several musical items were given during the evening, and the Benediction closed an interesting and successful gathering.

Portsmouth, High street.—The last survivor—or nearly so—of John Pounds' pupils at the Ragged School, which the old cobbler founded in St. Mary's-street, Portsmouth, has just passed away in the person of Mrs. Ann Shill, of 31, Highbury-street, at the age of 76 years. In the historical picture of Mr. Sheaf—himself a local shoemaker—Mrs. Shill is shown as a girl nine years old, with her arm round her sister's neck. Like her old teacher, Mrs. Shill also helped to bring up several young children and give them a start in life, in as far as her means would allow her to do.

Suffolk Village Mission: Bedford.—Sunday, October 21, was the thirteenth anniversary of the founding of this Mission, and the Rev. Frederick Summers, of London, was the special preacher. Afternoon and evening large congregations came together from the adjoining villages, and filled the Bedford Chapel on both occasions. The annual tea meeting was held on Monday evening. Miss Tagart presided, and was supported by Mrs. Briddall and Miss Hill (of the Central Postal Mission), Revs. F. Summers, W. Birks, and R. Newell. The room was well filled, and the meeting was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. Newell gave a hearty welcome to new members, and indicated the programme of the winter's work. In conjunction with the anniversary services a special seven days' mission was conducted by Mr. Summers, consisting of house-to-house visitation with tract distribution, and special religious services in the evenings. In each of the three parishes, Bedford, Monk Scham, and Worlingworth, the people appreciated both the visits and the services, and there is no doubt that much good was done.

FRIENDS in and about London are reminded that not only those who have received personal invitations, but all who are able and glad to be present, will be cordially welcomed to the farewell reception to Dr. Crothers at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening. He is to give an address at a quarter to nine.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

[ANOTHER holiday sermon, on "Niagara," by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, we hope to publish in next week's INQUIRER.

THE address to Mr. S. S. Tayler on his retirement from the hon. secretaryship of the Stamford-street Sunday School, which he has held for thirty-two years, is to be presented after morning service to-morrow (Sunday), on occasion of the Sunday School Anniversary. It is hoped that all who have signed the address may be able to be present at the service.

MR. F. J. M. STRATTON, B.A., of Cambridge, University Smith's Prizeman, 1906, and Isaac Newton student, 1905, has been elected to a Drosier Fellowship at Caius College. This means, we understand, six years; to be devoted to astronomical research; and we congratulate not only Mr. Stratton on this fresh distinction, but all the friends who are interested in our Cambridge services, for which Mr. Stratton has once more undertaken to act as secretary.

THE opening of the Committee stage of the Education Bill in the House of Lords has not been very promising. In spite of the Primate's warning that he would not support "wrecking" amendments, we have seen him and the Bishops generally supporting an addition to Clause I. to the effect that all option as to providing religious teaching is taken from the communities affected. Henceforth religious teaching must be arranged for every school day—if the amendment is accepted by the Commons. Meanwhile we are curious to know what kind of religious teaching is thus to be provided, and there the crux will come. On Clause II. a proposal to compel local authorities to take over "voluntary" schools led on Tuesday evening to a confused scene, the only clear point being that such a proposal, involving as it does serious financial burdens on the ratepayers, is beyond the constitutional power of the Upper House to make.

ON Wednesday the Lords pursued their amending policy still further, the Archbishop of Canterbury and his friends being determined to get denominationalism well established and endowed. It would be tedious to enter into detail on the many suggestions made, not without further confusion, by one peer and another. The general effect of the changes made and foreshadowed is evident from the fact that a special meeting of the Evangelical Free Church Council has been called for Monday next to "demonstrate" against them. Our sympathy is certainly much more with the Nonconformists than with the Clericals, but we should remind both parties that this is not a sectarian but a national question. The plain citizen is not edified by this scramble for denominational advantage, and is disposed to cry, "a plague o' both your houses." If a strong voice could be heard in the Legislature warning off these partisans and spoilers it would be widely welcome.

THE National Anti-Sweating League has been holding a successful three days' conference on the Minimum Wage at the Guildhall. The first session was opened by the Lord Mayor, attended by his mace bearer, and the chairmen were successively Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., Mr. George Barnes, M.P., and the Earl of Dunraven. Sir Charles has had charge of the Minimum Wage Bill, which has been introduced into the House of Commons; Mr. Barnes represents the Independent Labour Party, of which he is one of the original members, and the Earl was chairman of that House of Lords Committee on Sweating which inquired into the subject nearly twenty years ago.

A GOOD deal has happened in the interval. The great strike of dock labourers, with its cry of the "docker's tanner," was followed by the miners' strike, when the thought of the "living wage" had so much to do with turning popular sympathy in the men's direction. The term

"sweating" is usually confined to "sub-contract" or "home" work, and very largely affects women, though men are also its victims. But gross underpayment of labour is not confined to industries which are technically sweated industries, and the whole question of the necessary minimum of wage is before the country. Another thing has happened, and one which is likely to have great effect on a people like the English, who always distrust any truth which is also new. Our Australasian colonies have introduced a legal minimum, and, as it is claimed, with most beneficial results.

UNDER such circumstances as these, the Anti-Sweating League has held its first conference, and sums up its deliberations with the following resolution:—

"That this Conference welcomes the formation of the National Anti-Sweating League, heartily endorses the policy of securing by legislative action a Minimum Wage in the Sweated Industries, and pledges itself to forward that policy by every means in its power."

THE Conference represented both a strong movement for bringing the question within the sphere of practical politics, and a serious effort to enlighten and inform the country on the issues involved. The proceedings are to be published, and there will be further and more convenient opportunity of dealing with the various papers and discussions. Among those who read papers were Mr. J. A. Hobson and Mr. Sidney Webb, who dealt with the economic problems. The Hon. Bernard Wise and Mr. Pember Reeves described the Australasian experiments, remarking that it was not necessary at this time of day to prove the advantage of a minimum wage, but merely to persuade the country. Other branches were dealt with by Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Miss Clementina Black, Mr. Stephen Walsh, and Mr. Chiozza Money, M.P.

DR. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL, who is now in her eighty-sixth year, and was the first woman to take a medical degree and enter the profession (she graduated at Geneva, N.Y., in 1849, and afterwards studied in Paris and London), paid a visit this summer to her relatives in America, after an interval of 37 years. While she was there, her sister, Dr. Emily Blackwell, with whom she established the first infirmary and dispensary under the direction of women doctors in New York in 1857, celebrated (on October 8) her eightieth birthday. Dr. Elizabeth returned last Saturday to her home at Hastings. The two sisters are natives of Bristol, but went as children with their parents to America. The younger sister has spent the whole of her working life in America; the elder settled in this country again in 1869. It is a story of noble courage and consecration to the highest service which Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell has told in her volume of autobiographical sketches, "Pioneer Work in opening the Medical Profession to Women," published eleven years ago. Another little book of hers, "Counsel to Parents on the Moral Education of their Children in Relation to Sex," which rapidly went through several editions, was another piece of admirable pioneer work, by which she earned the gratitude of large numbers, to whom she had thus spoken a sorely needed word.

A LITTLE book of an exceptionally interesting nature is about to be printed which will contain addresses from different parts of Russia and various classes of Russians in reply to the British Memorial to the late Duma. The delegation from this country has not been allowed to go to Russia to present its Address. Under the circumstances this was perhaps not to be expected or even hoped for. It is hard, no doubt, to have to stand aside unable to do anything for the Russian people in their struggle for freedom, but in the affairs of nations it is specially true that each must work out his own salvation. The Russian people have the sympathy of the friends of freedom and justice here and elsewhere, and they know it—as knowledge grows they come to know it more and more, and the assurance of this fellow-feeling, of what the peasants finely call their "English brethren," will itself strengthen them for the fight.

NOVEMBER 24 is the date now arranged for the simultaneous publication in this country and America of the first volume of the "Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels," edited by Dr. James Hastings, and Dr. J. A. Selbie. Messrs. T. & T. Clark are the publishers, and the dictionary will be completed in two large volumes, similar in size to Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible." It is, however, a work quite distinct from that dictionary. The articles are all new. They are written by new men, and with a new purpose. It is, first of all, a preacher's dictionary. Its authors are preachers. First, they are scholars—for without scholarship the work would be worthless. But they are scholars who know how much more it needs to be a preacher.

AN HISTORY of the three Methodist organisations which are shortly to be united is said to be in preparation and to have received the sanction of the joint committee.

MR. W. P. HARTLEY has made an offer to add one-third to any increase in the Primitive Methodist African Mission Fund.

ENGLAND BEYOND SEAS.

IN allowing the implication borne by this title, I trust I shall not be repeating a mistake made by a dark-skinned African while looking at the dusky bronze statue of Van Riebeck which stands gazing up one of the main streets of Cape Town, with the sea at his back. Having looked at the blackened figure for some moments, the coloured observer turned to a friend and said with deep satisfaction: "I never knew before that this great man was of our folk." We are apt to read our own predilections into the things we see, when outward signs seem to confirm them. And yet if the "City of Cape Town" (as it is officially designated) represents the Cape as London represents English life and thought, and British South Africa is only a larger Cape, we may legitimately regard this vast Colony, or group of Colonies, as a greater England beyond the sea.

I was not prepared for this deduction. I had supposed that our distant Colonies holding life under new conditions would have developed a new civilisation and initiated a new era. As it is, you are much farther from England not only in Brittany across the English Channel, but even in Wales across the Severn, than you are in Cape Colony. Now it may be that it is the very greatness of England that prevents Colonial expansion upon original lines. It is curious to be so far away from England and yet be so constantly under the shadow of England. You ask a longshoreman how the harbour lies, and he replies: "looking straight toward England," and not in terms of the compass. You look at the shops and see that articles of English manufacture everywhere abound. You glance over the papers and find that news of minutest interest are daily cabled from England. English magazines predominate on the tables in the libraries, while the shelves are stocked with English works. South African writers, of whom there are but few, publish in England and first appeal to the English public, who decide the good or evil fortune of a literary work. It is unfortunate that South African Art and South African Music should be so largely imported and that in intellectual and artistic matters the Cape ranks only among English "dependencies abroad."

And yet so much meets the eye to belie the derivative and imported mental life of the community. The skies are most un-English in their clearness and crystalline brightness. The air is rare and pure and resonant, with the disadvantage that every sound is magnified and distant noises sound close at hand, while the natural configuration of the background of mountain, forming a section of an amphitheatre turn Cape Town into a huge whispering-gallery. The flora is magnificently alien, and the variety and loveliness of the blooms one meets in the bush, simply bewilder the beholder, while they charm and enchant him. The birds wear strange plumage, and call to each other in unfamiliar cries. All the nations of the earth have come together to make up the population. From the most unpromising black to the purest Circassian white lie all shades and gradations of human colour, ringing the changes on red and brown and yellow. The diversity of tongue testifies to the cosmopolitan nature of the inhabitants, but enhances the value of their common acquired English speech. Even the Dutch seem more concerned with the doings of England than of the Netherlands, though they have reason to regard with mixed feelings that small sea-girt isle, whose people will never let them alone, but insist on adopting them into the family and sharing the heirlooms. In adopting the English government, they adopt Oxford and Cambridge and London, with Fleet-street and the Royal Academy of Art and Music somewhere in their train—and that is an important factor for the future evolution of the country. The Dutch Reformed Churches may hug their old traditions and pretend to ignore the Higher Criticism and the Social Problem, but in these matters both Holland and England are making raids upon their mental territory, and their subjection is only a matter of time. Exclusive modes of thought are favoured by the separation of races, and the welding together of diverse racial elements must tend to a fuller as well as a freer life. It is the privilege of England to be offered the opportunity of presiding over this fusion of materials so varied and discordant, and nurture the child of its old age to a status of independence and self-reliance. The greatest benefit England could confer upon the Cape is to make itself unnecessary to it, help it to find a life of its own, fresh, vigorous and new, a life in accord with the bounties of Nature, and in glad harmony with the bright and sunny clime. A Colony that can produce a flora which equals in variety and beauty that of the whole of Europe, will not be lacking in other resources of utilitarian and æsthetic worth. The author of "Plants and their Ways in South Africa," writes:—"South Africa, with its wealth of beautiful flowers, can well dispense with introduced flowers, except the roses and violets which were lacking—and how they do thrive!"—which reads like a parable. The exquisite fragrance of the modest English violet, and the tender and refined beauty of the beloved English rose symbolise those very qualities which South Africa has most need of receiving from us. We have sent thorns and bristles enough—aggression and devouring enterprise, the results of which are too apparent in the general depression that weighs down the land; let us now send roses and violets, the refinement, the courtesy, the ripe wisdom, the tender sympathy, due from a people of vaster and wider experience to a younger folk. "We were lacking in roses and violets, until England sent them to us—and now how they thrive among us!"

J. TYSSUL DAVIS.

It will be seen from the report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association Council meeting that the Rev. T. P. Spedding gave a very interesting address on the Unitarian Van Mission. He had with him some picture post-cards, showing the van in all its glory, "Unitarian Van" clearly to be read on its front and side, and larger still upon the front—"Truth, Liberty, and Religion."

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

I DOUBT whether many people read the poetry of George Herbert now; but he will continue to have his lovers, and his name is not likely to be forgotten so long as the Church retains its honour for sainthood. It was a sainthood of a peculiarly English type, without the stormy emotions or the dramatic self-sacrifices of men of more passionate blood—quiet, restrained, marked by delicacy rather than by strength of feeling, but with its own power and charm.

The reign of James I. was hardly the time when we should look for the practice of holiness. The splendours of the Elizabethan age had passed away. New problems of government and religion were pressing upon men's minds. The Church had broken definitely with Rome, but Papal intrigue was busy at work, while High Churchmen of the type of Laud encouraged an attitude of embittered hostility to the Puritanism of the common people. The Civil War was about to re-cast the forms of national life and to set the problems of the next two hundred years. It was the day of the intrepid leader, the skilful plotter, the unscrupulous advocate in politics—of the controversialist, the pamphleteer, the ecclesiastical lawyer in religion. But in this din of contending factions it is possible for us to keep company with a little group of men who, in different ways, had given their hearts to the beauty of holiness and left the gauds and ambitions of this world for "the sweetness of Jesus."² Such were Dr. John Donne, the Dean of St. Paul's; Richard Crashaw, the ardent mystical poet; Nicholas Ferrar, of Little Gidding; George Herbert, of Bemerton. And yet Herbert was in many respects the product of his age: He was a noble and a gentleman. He was bred in the atmosphere of the University and the Court. In the humblest offices he was never without an air of distinction and refinement, which, if in part it was the work of grace, was also the fruit of good breeding and sensitive taste:

George Herbert was born in Montgomery Castle, the ancestral home, in 1593. When he was three years old his father died, and shortly afterwards his mother moved to Oxford in order to supervise the education of her eldest son, Edward, the Lord Herbert of Cherbury, who has told the story of his life in a book which Horace Walpole has described as "perhaps the most extraordinary account that ever was given seriously by a wise man of himself." Magdalen Herbert was a woman of no ordinary gifts, and her rare charm and sweetness of manner won for her troops of friends among the most distinguished in the land. George owed much to her deep piety and her sincere veneration for holy things: It was of her, in the gracious evening of her life, that Donne wrote the beautiful lines:—

"No spring nor summer-beauty has such grace

As I have seen in an autumnal face."

The brilliant boy passed through Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He became a fellow in 1615, and in 1620 he was elected to the office of Public Orator to the University, and apparently the world lay at his feet: But it is not Herbert the elegant Latin scholar, writing complimentary letters to the King and his Chancellor, a favoured person at Court, with a fashionable career open before him, but the poor country parson of Bemerton who is of interest to posterity. That he felt the attraction of political life and cultivated society strongly for a time, there can be no doubt; but it is a strange misreading of the deeper motives of a life, which was never without its fervent spiritual aspirations and a tender reverence for the beauty of sacred things, which can discover nothing but the fruit of frustrated ambition in the piety of his later years. "The activity and sweetness that marked his pastoral life at Bemerton," says Mr. Shorthouse, "amidst ever-increasing weakness and approaching death, were not the result of disappointed political hopes. Such years do not follow on such a youth, and such fruit is not grown on such a stock. Those verses, which have been called with singular infelicity 'the enigmatical history of a difficult resignation,' are in fact the spiritual instinct of a human life consecrated to God amid the pleasures, the temptations, the pains of this world's courts and cities."

It was in 1630 that he was presented, through the influence of his kinsman the Earl of Pembroke, to the small living of Fulston St. Peters and Bemerton, near Salisbury, with the cure of three hundred poor souls—a higher privilege, as he had come to regard it, than anything else which the world had to offer him. He found the parsonage house in an almost ruinous condition, and the little church so dirty and neglected as to be quite unfit for its sacred uses. His first work was to restore it, and in arrangement and simple adornment to make it suitable for the beautiful ritual of Christian devotion. Then, quietly and patiently, he set himself to inspire his parishioners with a sense of the reality of heavenly things, teaching them to weave the influence of sacred seasons and the services of religion into their daily thought and toil. Daily, at ten and four, he read prayers in the church, and, as Izaak Walton tells us, he "brought most of his parishioners, and many gentlemen in the neighbourhood, constantly to make a part of his congregation twice a day; and some of the meaner sort of his parish did so love and reverence Mr. Herbert, that they would let their plough rest when Mr. Herbert's saint's-bell rung to prayers." That these quiet and holy labours had in them no element of difficult resignation we have the evidence of his own words:—"I now look back on my aspiring thoughts and think myself more happy than if I had attain'd what then I so ambitiously thirsted for. And I can now behold the Court with an impartial eye, and see plainly that it is made up of frauds and titles and flattery, and many other such empty, imaginary, painted pleasures; pleasures that are so empty as not to satisfy when they are enjoyed: but in God and His service is a fullness of all joy, and pleasure, and no satiety."

A few days before his death, in 1633—for this apostolical ministry was destined to last barely three short years—he gave a commission to a friend by his bedside in the following terms: "Sir, I pray deliver this little book to my dear brother Farrer, and tell him he shall find in it a picture of the many spiritual conflicts that have passed betwixt God and my soul, before I could subject mine to the will of Jesus my Master: in whose service I have now found perfect freedom. Desire him to read it; and then, if he can think it may turn to the advantage of any dejected poor soul, let it be made public; if not let him burn it; for I and it are less than the least of God's mercies." This little book was the manuscript of "The Temple; or, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations," the volume of verse upon which the fame of George Herbert as a poet rests. Next to the purity and sweetness of his own life, it is his most precious legacy to the world. It is hardly possible, except by the happy expedient of leisurely reading, to gain any idea of its quaintness and of the personal intimacy of its devotional feeling. "Herbert speaks to God," says Richard Baxter, "like a man that really believeth in God, and whose business in the world is most with God: heart-work and heaven-work make up his book." It is a collection of poems, all of them brief, some of them hardly more than an ejaculation of praise or need; but most of the moods of the soul in its experience of religion find expression. Now it is the note of exultant joy which is struck:—

"Let all the world in ev'ry corner sing
My God and King."

Now it is the confession of the power of some secret sin to frustrate the grace of God:—

"Lord, with what care hast Thou begirt us round!

Parents first season us; then school-masters

Deliver us to laws; they send us bound
To rules of reason, holy messengers, Pulpits and Sundayes, sorrow dogging
sinne,

Afflictions sorted, anguish of all sizes,
Fine nets and stratagems to catch us in,
Bibles laid open, millions of surprises;
Blessings beforehand, tyes of gratefulnesse,

The sound of glorie ringing in our eares,
Without, our shame; within, our con-sciences;

Angels and grace, eternall hopes and fears.

Yet all these fences and their whole array
One cunning bosome-sin blows quite away."

At other times we listen to the confession or the plaintive yearning of his own heart:

"Come, Lord, my head doth burn, my heart is sick,

While Thou dost ever, ever stay;

Thy long deferrings wound me to the quick,

My spirit gaspeth night and day;

O show Thyself to me

Or take me up to Thee."

Or, again, it is quiet joy in the sense of restored mercy and peace:

"And now in age I bud again,

After so many deaths I live and write;

I once more smell the dew and rain,

And relish versing: O my onely Light,

It cannot be

That I am he

On whom Thy tempests fell all night:

These are Thy wonders, Lord of Love."²

George Herbert is not a poet of rich and powerful imagination; and his love for the curiosities of expression interferes in some degree with the simplicity of his diction. But he has the gift of winning affection, and of being companionable in the intimacies of feeling where most companions are an intrusion. He can give substance and beauty to evanescent emotions in a way which few men have been able to do, and by the alchemy of his verse change the coarser desires of our hearts into the fine gold of love and prayer. Like the psalmist, he drew from the deep wells of his own experience; and his poetry will live because it is so intensely personal, the autobiography of a most sensitive and beautiful soul. W. H. D.

A SWISS VIEW OF NEW ENGLAND.*

HERR PFARRER ALFRED ALTHERR, of Basel, President of the Swiss Verein für freies Christentum, a stalwart champion of reform in its early days, and a correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was invited two years ago to lecture in Boston, at the Unitarian Anniversary Meetings on Religious Literature in Switzerland. He made use of the occasion to see as much of the Eastern States as his time of leave would permit, kept his eyes wide open and his pen at work during the whole of his journey, and on his return published a selection of his letters home:

The resulting book, which, with an appendix on Helen Keller, reaches to 240 pp. 8vo., is pleasant and interesting from cover to cover. The author has just the right equipment for his task—a power of keen and quiet observation, wide and perceptive sympathy, patience, humour, and the art of making friends. His judgments are ripe, modest, and fearless, and piquantly flavoured with the prepossessions of a formed and strong character. He is perfectly well aware of his own little deviations from a strictly judicial attitude, and willing to share your smile at them, but not in the least ashamed of them. Besides all this, he has an easy style, not without wit, can present a portrait or suggest an atmosphere in few words, tells his stories well, and, above all, has the knack of hitting on interesting things wherever he goes:

For instance, the second line in the book introduces two married couples, Scotch people returning from Venice, with whom the Herr Pfarrer shares a compartment from Basel to Paris. Before long we find him singing German folk-songs with one of them, who had studied at Heidelberg. They talk, and the singer turns out to be an old acquaintance of Dr. Martineau, and full of information about Channing and Theodore Parker. Now Theodore Parker is the author's hero, whose biography he has written. What could be happier? "We quickly made friends," and set up community of goods at luncheon-time. In the next stage our Pfarrer comes across an agent of the gambling-hell at Monaco, whose business it is to travel about in express trains, and stimulate the gambling fever by losing at rouge et noir. Then he remarks on the masses of mistletoe in the trees that line the railway. At first he took them for birds' nests, but was enlightened by a professor of Natural Science at the Sorbonne, who receives a salary of 18,000 fr., abhors the clergy, and regards Jesus as a myth. By the time this interesting person has explained his views, the masts of Havre are in sight; but before Herr Altherr reaches his ship he has a political discussion with an old out-porter, and receives the confidences of a young man whose heart is torn asunder by love of the ocean and love of Angélie.

Such incidents, in recording which the author unconsciously reveals his own kindness, enliven the whole journey. We have also an abundance of humorous reflection, and many terse dicta on such topics as American dwellings, cemeteries, statues, schools, President Roosevelt, the English language, Yankee abstinence (somewhat ruefully dwelt on), the negro question, chivalry towards women, and much more. The Swiss pastor finds fellow-countrymen everywhere, and makes us almost as glad to meet them as he was. The second generation, however, repudiate their Swiss nationality—"No, sir, American." Here is a little story which serves as a tailpiece to chapter x.:—"Of course they have cremation in America; they had it before we did, and it is continually increasing. When I called at the office of the Amerikanische Schweizer-Zeitung, in the oldest part of New York, I found in the narrow room, amid piled-up layers of paper, a fellow-countryman called Siebenmann at work. 'Do you manage the whole work of that big newspaper alone?' I asked. 'Oh, no, Herr Pfarrer,' he laughed, 'there are five of us, and three of them are here in this room.' I turned round, for I supposed the invisible two must be writing somewhere behind the paper mountains, but all my hunting failed to unearth them. 'Two of the five are here,' said Herr Siebenmann, and lifted the lids from two brass vessels, which I had supposed to contain tobacco or something of that sort. 'Look, these are our two departed colleagues.' In each jar was a little heap of ashes, with small porous bones."²

The necessity of personally delivering a present from a ninety-year-old father in the old country to a son on the Hudson takes Pfarrer Altherr to the great Edison works, where his old schoolfellow John Krüsi had been the inventor's right hand. We have a vivid description of the place. The author's connection with "dear old Krüsi" opens the doors of the inaccessible magician himself. As he stood in the waiting room at Orange the visitor imagined that he had strayed into a lunatic asylum, such an extraordinary mixture of voices and instruments, holding forth in oration, solo, chorus and symphony, came in hurly-burly through the window: phonographs were being tested. Edison claimed the phonograph as his greatest achievement, and was confident that he would eventually produce an instrument so perfect as to reproduce, with absolute truth, every instrument in a great orchestra. He put forward, not as a wild poet's dream, but as the project of a practical business man, the good time to come, when the inhabitants of lonely islands and hidden mountain hamlets shall listen entranced to the preacher in Westminster Abbey, the singer in Paris or St. Petersburg, the concert in New York or Tokio. The very first utterance of the very first phonograph, it seems, was Edison's rendering of the immortal lines which begin, "Mary had a little lamb."

The main theme of the book is what happened at Boston—the Anniversary Meetings and Emerson Memorial meetings, with all the encounters, new acquaintances, excursions and visits, and the reflections they aroused. "I am surprised to find that whenever I have come across Unitarians hitherto, it is never Parker, but always W. E. Channing, who predominates as their real leader. A monument to Channing has just been completed in a beautiful site, opposite the Arlington Church, where he once preached, whereas Parker's seems still to linger in the remote distance. The present central rendezvous of the Unitarians is called specially Channing Hall, whereas the Parker Memorial is a house where the Benevolent Fraternity Society is lodged, and contains all sorts of rooms for religious gatherings, libraries, evening-schools, charities, and the like. But I admit that the modest house, dedicated to all good works, is appropriately associated with the greatest preacher of practical love to God and man." The votary makes his pilgrimage to the shrine at Lexington, and relates every incident—down to the "salmon and potatoes, cakes and strawberries, icewater and coffee: quite American," which the "Rev. Staples" gave him for lunch, and the formal introduction to the maid-servant, which surprised this democratic Schweizer very much. But relic-hunting, he concludes, "is somewhat foolish and pitiable. Nothing really comes of it. On the other hand," the mother of friend Wendte here in Boston, a fine delicate little woman of eighty-one years, who once kept school near Parker, knew him quite well personally and tells of him with flashing eyes—that is something."

We have the delegate's greeting from the little republic to the great one given in full, and a summary of his lecture on "The Origin of Growth of the Liberal Churches in Switzerland." We also have a diary of the meetings, full of known names and familiar emotions, and giving a delightful impression of American Unitarianism. Among the special characteristics of the sermons and addresses delivered at Boston Pfarrer Altherr remarks: (1) An absence of any narrow glorification of party, as if everybody who wished to pass for a free-thinking and cultured man must be a Unitarian. (2) Much self-criticism; this is not confined to New England. (3) The reiterated reminder that free thought in religious subjects does not of itself constitute goodness, let alone Christianity. (4) The insistence that the outward prosperity, unless balanced by inner striving, is a danger to character: the springs of life are in the heart. (5) The large numbers of Unitarians who had come over, through conviction, from other denominations, and the broadening movement among the orthodox of which this is symptomatic.

The account of the great day ends (παρά προσδοκίαν) somewhat with the following note, which I quote in support of what I last wrote in the INQUIRER. "Einen gerechten Abscheu hat man hier vor dem Spucken; In the railway-station at Philadelphia it costs according to announcement 500 dollars, in Boston 100 dollars, which seems enough. But the practical American does not merely forbid, he helps at the same time. Cuspidors (i.e. spittoons) are everywhere to be found. In the rooms where the meetings are held there is one by the side of every chair."

Besides a report of the great Emerson festival, and the pious sight-seeing which it entails, we have tributes to Garrison and to Longfellow, whom our author greatly admires—though he does not know after what character, in what novel, by what writer the steamer "Priscilla" has been named! And, apart altogether from this ready-made interest, the book is thoroughly readable, without a single dull page. It may be cordially recommended to every reader of German.

THE BATH MEMORIAL.

WE noted last week the unveiling in Trim-street Chapel, Bath, on Sunday, October 21, of the memorial brass to five Mayors of Bath, Sir Jerom Murch, Thomas Jolly, Handel Cossham, J.P., M.P., William Crucknell Jolly, J.P., and John Ricketts, J.P., who had been worshippers in that chapel. A memorial sermon was preached on that occasion by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., D.D., a native of Bath, whose father, the late Rev. W. J. Odgers, was minister of Trim-street Chapel 1853-1874.

"Citizen of no mean city" (Acts xxi. 39), was the text Dr. Odgers took for his sermon,* and speaking first, in a reminiscent vein, he said that was a day of public memorial, but who could prevent its being one of private and personal reminiscence at the same time? To himself the occasion brought back memories associated with his early life, which he trusted as long as he lived he should always cherish. How many of the scenes of that early life of his grouped themselves around that chapel as its natural centre! There he sat as a schoolboy under his father's ministry, there it was his privilege to know four of the men whom that tablet unveiled commemorated, and there he knew others who took their places in the portrait gallery of memory and whose figures would never be erased. He knew where they sat, those quiet, venerable presences, visiting the House of God from week to week. His first feeling was one of deep gratitude. He realised as never before the value of the ties that bind, or may bind, age and youth, that link together generations of living men. He remembered that chapel before it was as now, for soon after 1853 all but the external walls were changed, and he believed the pulpit in which he stood was the only piece of wood-work that remained of the old chapel which was built in 1795, when it replaced the older chapel in Frog-lane (now New Bond-street), built in 1692. He thought of those who were to him little more than pictures—Miss Prime, a venerable lady who seemed to have walked out of the Bath of the previous century and used to enter with her footman bearing her books behind her; Mrs. Davenport, sister of the then Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Longley) and one of the most sweet and venerable old ladies he had ever known; the two Watsons and others who found it worth while to be kind to a boy, and to enable him to see, perhaps as few have seen, the beauty of the face in a ripe age. He thought of others like James Jeffery and Charles Moore, who helped him more than any others, perhaps, to a love of antiquity on the one side, and a love of nature on the other. He thought of many gone; he thought of two or three living. When he spoke of those whose names were particularly in their minds that day, what should he say, for he felt in face of the very memory of these men that he was a boy again, and diffident in speaking of those who were to him as his venerable elders. Jerom Murch, spared far beyond the ordinary span of life, knitted together the generations as none other. He was minister of that chapel when his (the preacher's) mother, as a young woman, came to Bath every season with her uncle and aunt; he was his father's friend. He remembered that he once heard Mr. Murch preach in that pulpit. After he laid down the ministry he became the treasurer, and the devoted servant of that congregation.

Dr. Odgers spoke further of Sir Jerom as one of the Hibbert Trustees, by whom such great service had been done, especially in gaining recognition for the science of Comparative Religion, through the series of Hibbert Lectures. Then he spoke of the Jollys, father and son, and of John Ricketts, whom he had also known. Of Handel Cossham he could only speak from the testimony of others, but he heard from friends what a stimulating and magnetic personality he was. There was one thing which he particularly liked about him, and that was that as a "gotten on" man he was unrestingly desirous of bringing on and up other people with him. He was a man who had a passion for making people understand what he thought, and what he hoped for, and what he believed. Unresting, he seemed to have thrown himself out of private business into public life with a zest and a hunger that was never satisfied, and all through, from the time that he took up municipal and Parliamentary life, to the day in which he was smitten down, never to recover, within the walls of the House of Commons, there was about him that kind of desire and regret which Theodore Parker put into the touching words, "The worst of it is that I am in a hurry and God is not." They still wanted that kind of man, who burned to make his fellows see what he saw. Those five names represented an active connection between that chapel and public life. That was true, but he would not have what had been called the denominational conceit to say that it was because they were members of that chapel that they loved their neighbour and served him. He took it that they were not exceptions, but they were types, and he took it that in the worship of that place they found a stimulus to the service of God and of their neighbours. He had heard it said that the Unitarians shared so much public work because they believed in works, as if it were their misfortune, if not their fault. But it was, perhaps, for the same reason that Unitarians had been called the most over-represented religious body in the country. Their denomination did not employ all their energies, and urged them, rather than discouraged them, to take up the wider sphere and the larger life. Indeed, as a minister of religion he had been rather concerned to maintain that the gospel of good citizenship was not the only gospel that the age required, and that the fact that the man attended the Town Council on Wednesday and the Hospital Board on Friday, did not constitute any valid reason why he should not attend public worship on Sunday.

Those tablets commemorated the honourable continuity of social service and public work in connection with a body that was continuous, that was, historically, always alive. That was a thing the importance of which they could hardly overrate in these days. There was no such thing—though it was apt to be forgotten—for a people with a history, no such thing for a commercial and industrial state, as a policy of "clean slate" and unlimited experiment. They had to take up things as they were, and the improvements had to come from the devotion of those who, without revolution and without a dead stop, would see the thing bettering itself as it went along, and that was the interpretation which he would put on those words of Professor Henry Jones on the coming of Socialism—"The beginning and need of the present duty, the thing we have, above all, to insist on is this: that we must moralise our social relations as they stand." There was no such school for men who meant to make things better, who meant to bring the Kingdom of Heaven where they were, as the working of the continuous municipal life of an English community. It was a school which English people had, and which other people had not, and for lack of which ideal constitutions framed by geniuses had failed, not from lack of ability or devotion, but from the absence of the insight as to the conditions of joining what ought to be with what is, and of helpers and subordinates trained in the practical school of local administration.

Having spoken further of the ideal of public service, of municipal corporations as schools of social usefulness, and the strengthening of the sense of public duty, above all party and sectarian claims, which had followed the creation of the first School Boards, and the first County Councils, Dr. Odgers concluded by quoting the following lines, which had been familiar to him, as he said, since the days when at King Edward's School they used to essay to turn them into Latin verse:—

"What constitutes a state?

Not high-raised battlements or laboured mound,

Thick wall or moated gate: : : :

No, men, high-minded men,

Men who their duties know,

But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain.

These constitute a state.

And sovereign Law, that with collected will,

Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill."

"A MAN who has no fear of hell for himself should not talk about it very much."—Methodist Times.

A TRIANGULAR DEBATE.

"Is the Bible, the Church, or the Conscience the final authority?" was the subject of debate at the Young Men's Christian Association, Liverpool, on Monday evening, October 15, between an Anglican, the Vicar of St. Brides, a Roman Catholic, Father Day, S.J., and a Unitarian, the Minister of Hope-street Church.

Some impressions of such an interesting occurrence may possess, it has been suggested, a certain value.

In the first place, though no public announcement of the meeting was made, the audience, at first overflowing a hall seating over 300, went near to filling the large hall, which will hold 900. There would be six to seven hundred people present. It was an audience, too, quite magnificent in its tone and bearing. No point made by a speaker fell on dull, irresponsive ears: though the fact of the meeting itself, coupled with the brilliant and bold thought of its originators, the officers of the Literary and Debating Society, was the really significant feature of a notable evening. Not often in such circumstances is the heretic compelled to pick up his watch from the table in order to convey to an applauding audience that his speaking time is being seriously curtailed. No vote was taken at the end. It is quite certain that if it had been, "the Bible," not "the Conscience," would have had it. Yet it was a sign of the times that the Secretary of the Y.M.C.A., speaking a few words after the three disputants, himself confessed to the difficulty of coming to a decision on the matter.

Of the debate itself not much can be said. In the twenty minutes allowed to each cause, only the barest exposition could be given. And this brevity bore most hardly upon the advocate of "the Man." (For some unexplained reason, the Y.M.C.A. authorities would not allow for "the Conscience" the proposed emendation of "the Man.") Upon him devolved the somewhat ungracious and thankless task of criticising the stupendous claims advanced for the other two. It is quite possible he did not make the real but limited function of the conscience as final arbiter as clear as might be. Some of the audience seemed to understand him as meaning that each individual man was presumed to be the sole author and maker of Truth: and, as modest men, they were aghast at the responsibility fastened upon them.

The "final authority," said the Rev. Bernard Jackson, "was the Bible in itself, interpreted by the Church. Without the Church we could not know nor understand the will of God. There were three conditions of authority that must be fulfilled: there must be (1) Divine Power, (2) the authority must be beyond the reach of contamination, (3) it must possess a complete knowledge of human life. The Bible evidenced all three conditions. The second statement was rather staggering, and also the argument for it. The Church is in the world, and may be contaminated; the Conscience is in this wicked world of men, and may be contaminated; the Bible is untouched, being a Book with the Divine Power behind, by external soiling of its purity.

Mr. Jackson is a young man, only 26, though already a vicar, is able, persuasive, earnest, a good speaker, of the ecclesiastical type: and he very favourably impressed us all by his transparent sincerity of speech, and, as we should judge, of life. Playfully twitted on his innocence of Biblical criticism, he admitted to being through two Honour Schools of Theology at Cambridge. And this is the university which, as Father Day remarked, has in the Rev. Arthur Wright, Vice-President of Queens', the author of "St. Luke's Gospel in Greek." In reply, Mr. Jackson said he would not trouble his audience with the "dryness" of Biblical criticism: only 2 Peter had been touched by it; Irenaeus testified to the Four Gospels: St. John's Gospel was quite safe: and, apparently, all was well.

This champion of the Bible is a refined and pleasing product of English public school and University life. But if he is a type of Cambridge Evangelicalism, those friends of liberal thought who think their work is done, and who consequently do not care to support the founding of new centres of an open spiritual faith, are likely to be sharply undeceived.

Father Day—one of the sons of Mr. Justice Day, who are in the Catholic priesthood—advanced the theory of various "spheres." There is (1) the sphere of Divine veracity, and so arrives the absolute veracity of God's word; (2) the sphere of Disposition, where Reason disposes to Faith, and in which motives and credentials are weighed by natural arguments; (3) the sphere of Authority rightly directing the man who has weighed the arguments and been convinced of this authority. This authority, the Church, tells the man what to believe: and what not to believe. It is (a) a safe, (b) a complete, (c) an universal guide. Revelation and tradition are the vehicles of truth: and the Church possesses the infallible authority of the teacher. Father Day was much milder than might have been expected on the dangers and apparent inconsistencies of the Bible, when not interpreted by the infallible Church. He marshalled few of Fénelon's masterly objections to the Bible on its face value.

The champion of "the Man" said religion had not been defined. He would quote with approval, and make his own, a definition from a sermon of Father Day's, preached in St. Helens: "Religion was simply a mutual bond of union between Almighty God and Man: it was a reciprocal relation of mind, and heart, and life, between Almighty God and His creature. . . . Religion was a reciprocal relation, and a mutual exchange of ideas and thoughts and affections between the Father in heaven and the child on earth."

But Father Day would accept no inferences of final authority from this. He had only spoken of religion from the "moral" side.

We may presume that each disputant was left in the position he had come sincerely to defend. Upon the audience the result would perhaps be similar: for there was no opportunity of getting into close grip. The champions were only roaring defiance. But the presentation—able, as was generally admitted—of three different aspects of a great problem, in a public assembly: delivered, as was also freely acknowledged, in a courteous manner, could not fail of right effect.

It must have been a trial to devout Catholics to hear an unsparing dissection of the methods of Councils, whether Trent or Vatican, and an unfolding of the conflicts of individual judgment which led to dogma: not excluding the dogma of Papal Infallibility. But the few voices raised in dissent or horror were at once calmed by the suggestion that all this might be left to Father Day to deal with. This "ornament of a historic society" freely admitted the badnesses of Councils and of Popes; but asked whether the Church which had lived through and in spite of it all, was not all she professed to be. He denied that the Church was a "mere registering machine": but essayed no explanation of his brother Jesuit Perroné's candid opinion of the Vatican Council: "All was ready (beforehand), and nothing was wanting, but the solemn proclamation of July 18, 1870."

The chairman, the Rev. D. P. Macpherson, once minister in succession to Hugh Stowell Brown, at Myrtle-street Chapel, and now an Anglican curate, suggested as final authority—Jesus Christ:

It was a rare occasion, and a remarkable meeting.

XLVII.

ZEAL, in the Greek of the New Testament, has a good sense and a bad, but more frequently a bad. It appears in the same lists with strife and faction, tumult and disorder. It is a name for jealousy; "zealous" in one place is "jealous" in another. If sometimes it is emulation, it is more often envy. And, if a good meaning occasionally goes with it, yet zeal is never spoken of as a gift, or a grace, or a fruit of the spirit. From these higher categories it is absent. Even the good sense is more than once qualified. There is a zeal "for God" which is not "according to knowledge," and, when the apostle would speak of his own former zeal, he cannot keep back the bitter thought that it had made him a persecutor and nothing more. The very derivation of the word is against it. It is "a boiling over." It is fervidness rather than fervour. It is born of excitement. It is a spirit of eagerness, fitful and irregular, bubbling up and dying down, like the spirit of a crowd. It goes with numbers, feeds upon applause, calls loudly for witnesses: "Come with me, and see." It is an eagerness that we catch one from another. Alone we can do little; with other eyes upon us, much. Sometimes it is purely official. We hold some position which obliges us to show interest; professional ardour comes to our help; with change of position interest changes also. Sometimes it is partial and one-sided, and fastens upon that which is not really vital to the cause or purpose in hand. "I was exceedingly zealous," says our apostle, "for the traditions of my fathers." He does not say it boastfully, rather with a feeling of shame that the traditions of men had once been more to him than the commandments of God. And sometimes it is strongly militant, loves fighting for fighting's sake, party-spirit in religion, as in politics. How easily zeal may become irreligious by becoming intemperate is shown by the word "zealot" which has grown out of it—a name now of more than doubtful repute.

Apart from its fitfulness and narrowness and leaning towards excess, zeal is a mixed passion into which private feeling often obtrudes itself. There is an element of anger in it, even of vindictiveness. It would call down fire from heaven. It is charged with protest and challenge, and flares out in destructive reform. Its driving is the driving of Jehu, barren in positive result when the blow is struck, and the driver's force is spent.

The virtue which New Testament writers commend in place of zeal is described by a term which has almost passed out of use. It is the virtue of "continuance." Continuance is zeal controlled, yet sustained—zeal which is held in, holds on, and holds out. It is energy exalted by faith, sweetened by charity, softened by humility, subdued by patience. It is to patient continuance that eternal life is promised at the last.

We deplore the fluctuations of religious activity, and wonder at the cause. We are hot and cold by turns, we know not why; starts of enterprise are followed by fits of apathy, we know not how. To special appeals and new sensations we respond; that which is out of the common sets us on fire—for a time. Authority and responsibility and the sense of influence quicken us into sudden action. If we may take the lead, we are all aglow; out of office we are out of sympathy with work and workers alike. Perhaps what we really want is, not more zeal, but less, with more of that commonplace quality of steady devotion which in secular matters is called perseverance. In business-life we do not look for ebullitions of force to carry us on. A continuous effort of will, we know by experience, is better than occasional outbursts of agitation. This capacity for going on taking pains is the soul of religion, as of business. It was continuance in well doing that made the Christian life, with its plodding consistency, a marvel to those who knew only the moods and crazes of religious zeal. It had no secondary motives; it was not spasmodic; it was not kept up by artificial stimulation. It was earnestness as distinct from eagerness, without variableness, because without vanity.

THE venerable Professor Albert Réville, of Paris, whose vigorous address at the International Council meeting last year at Geneva many of us had the privilege of hearing, has passed away at the age of eighty. A memorial notice will appear next week.

No poet ever yet has made, or ever can make, the most of human life, even poetically, who has not regarded it as standing on the threshold of an invisible world, as supported by Divine foundations.—J. C. Shairp.

ESSAYS IN RE-INSTATEMENT.

XXI.—HOLY DAYS.

THERE are at least three passages in St. Paul's Epistles which seem to leave the observance of one day above another quite open, and the argument of these passages, taken together, is so strong that in the opinion of many scholars it is doubtful whether in early times Christians were under any obligation to keep any day holy.

A word may be said about the Jewish Sabbath. It commemorated the rest which followed God's work of creation, and the rest which followed Israel's bondage in Egypt. It was a day of abstinence from work—not from harmless amusement—and also a day of holy assembly. When it began to be observed cannot exactly be said. There is little reference to it in the Historical Books and in the earlier Prophets, but during the Exile the later prophets spoke of sabbath-breaking as one of the most grievous of national sins, and after the Return its observance became one of the foremost duties of religion.

As to Christ's own attitude towards the Sabbath there can be no doubt. He speaks of it on no less than nine occasions, loses no opportunity of rescuing it from the hard and fast rules of rabbinical interpretation, and pierces through the whole outer covering of tradition to the inner core and essence of the first intention. In famous words, which clear the whole question, he declares that man was not made for the Sabbath.

But he said also that the Sabbath was made for man. Nor did he attempt to unmake it. As a day of rest and prayer and meditation; of communion with God and nature and man—in the synagogue, in the corn-field, in the home—he himself regarded and used it.

Of the dawn of the Christian Sunday little is known. In the Acts of the Apostles, and once in St. Paul, it is described as the First Day. In the Book of the Revelation it is spoken of as the Lord's Day. In writers of the second century references to this day as the accepted day of Christian worship are frequent. At last, in the fourth century, the observance of the day was secured throughout the Empire by imperial decree.

It is open, then, to anyone to take his stand on the broad, open ground of Christian liberty, and to refuse to be judged in respect of a Sabbath day, or any day. But, if he is conscious of mortal weakness, he will be glad to have the support of definite times for definite duties in religious life as much as in secular life. The question of Sunday observance is a question of religious discipline, and also of religious expediency. It is expedient for us that amid the occupations, distractions, and isolations of our weekly life there should be at least one recurring day to recall us to ourselves, to one another, and to God. It is the principle, not the day, that is all-important.

If thou bearest thy cross willingly, it will bar thee. If thou bearest it unwillingly, thou increasest thy load, and yet thou must bear it.—Thomas à Kempis.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

FOR the last three weeks I have told you in this column about something that was heroic. It is a part of our life that moves us very deeply. We feel that they are the noblest who can suffer bravely and patiently. And we know that in our own lives, in little things, we must begin to learn that great lesson. If you have to do a difficult thing, or have some pain to bear, you know it is right to go steadily on, and accept the task or the burden patiently and bravely; and if you do not fail, you are very glad and thankful afterwards. And whenever you have spoken some brave word of truth that cost you something, a great gladness comes into your heart, and a new strength to hold fast to what is right and good. You know, without anyone telling you, that that is the true way of life.

We have not to choose pain and difficulty, we have to choose always to do the right, and if that brings pain and difficulty with it, we understand that they must be bravely faced and borne; they are discipline which help to form noble character. And there is nothing in the whole world worth so much as that. They help us to grow up in the true way.

More than fifty years ago, at the time of the uprising of the people of Italy and their great struggle for freedom and the unity of their nation, Ugo Bassi was a brave preacher who sided with the people, and was not afraid himself to die for the good cause. In a poem, "The Disciples," which tells about him and other of the heroes of that time, there is an account of a sermon which Ugo once preached to the poor sufferers in a hospital in Rome. To help them to feel how noble it was to suffer quietly and patiently, he used the beautiful picture of the Vine. He reminded them how Jesus had compared himself and his disciples to the vine and its branches. The Master had shown them in his own life the meaning of faithful suffering, and as they followed him, they shared in the same true life. Now, the vine, if it is to bear good fruit, is not allowed to run wild, but is bound down, just as we are, in the strict way of duty, and all the idle tendrils and branches are pruned away. So all its strength goes into the beautiful fruit, and it helps to make the gladness of the world. And when its fruit is all gathered, and it is left bare and alone through the dark winter days, it still is patient, and from season to season does its appointed work.

"It endures in long, lone steadfastness
The winter through, and next year blossoms again;
Not bitter for the torment undergone,
Nor barren for the fulness yielded up;
As fair and fruitful towards the sacrifice,
As if no touch had ever come to it,
But the soft airs of heaven and dews of earth—

And so fulfils itself in love once more."
That is the parable which helped them to see that God has a good purpose even in pain. By learning to endure we come to understand better what He intends us to be, and how we may help, even in little things, to make life strong and beautiful and good;

FAREWELL TO DR. CROTHERS.

AFTER a visit of six months to this country, preaching during May and June at the Old Meeting Church, in Birmingham, and during September and October at Essex Church, Kensington, in exchange with their respective ministers, the Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D., has this week started for home, to return to his own congregation of the First Church in Cambridge, Mass. While in this country Dr. CROTHERS has thrown himself most heartily into the life of our churches, and has done far more for us than was implied simply in the two pulpit exchanges which were the immediate occasion of his visit. He gave this year's Essex Hall Lecture, on "The Making of Religion," now published, and preached at the Midland Ministers' Meeting at Evesham, the Annual Meeting of the Southern Association at Newport, I.W., and on other special occasions, including the opening of the Hall of the new Church at Aberdeen. He took part in the Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, in July, and in October preached in the College Chapel. He read a paper at the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting and during the last few weeks has lectured at Norwich, Leicester, Bolton, Gee Cross, Sheffield, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Newcastle. He had come, not as a stranger, but as one whose presence at the International meetings in London five years ago, was vividly remembered, and one who more recently found a new way to our hearts, by his delightful children's fairy tale, and those volumes of essays, "The Gentle Reader," and "The Pardoner's Wallet." On every ground it was impossible that he should be as a stranger in our midst, and he himself repeatedly bore witness to the home-feeling that he found in the fellowship of our churches. That was perfectly natural, for at the farewell meeting at Essex Church, Mr. WALLACE BRUCE told how he and Dr. CROTHERS had discovered that their ancestors in the old days of the conflict with episcopal tyranny in Scotland must have fought side by side, and were obliged at the same time to take refuge in the North of Ireland. The BRUCES stayed there, while from some CARRUTHERS who passed over to America, Dr. CROTHERS was descended; and on the far Pacific slope he had extended his views of religion from the old Presbyterianism to the wider thought of Unitarianism, as the BRUCES had done in the North of Ireland. And that night they two were met at Essex Church, which stood for a still wider freedom of spiritual faith.

During these last days, Dr. CROTHERS, and in a less degree Mrs. CROTHERS, and the members of their family, have been subjected to a perfect orgy of farewells. On Friday week there was the dinner of the London Laymen's Club, on Monday the farewell at Essex Church, and on Tuesday at a reception given by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, while on Wednesday Dr. CROTHERS went to Birmingham again for one more farewell. On Friday (we write in faith before the event) they sailed from Liverpool by the White Star s.s. Cymric, for Boston. May it be for them as happy a home-coming as it has been for us a delightful visit.

We often have the pleasure of welcoming our kindred of the Liberal Faith from across the Atlantic, and are happy in the constant interchange of such fellowship; but not often do we receive the impression of a new and inspiring personality, and a rare grace, beyond the power of words adequately to describe, such as we have found in Dr. CROTHERS. Our thoughts have gone back to the visit paid to this country twenty-four years ago, by the late Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. There, again, was the same winning grace of character, though in him it was in a beautiful old age. And we like to remember that these two, in different periods, at the beginning of their ministry, faced the problems of the great West, and trusted, not without reason, to the strength of their own manhood, and a single-hearted faith, to bear a brave testimony under those difficult conditions to spiritual truth and righteousness; and then, in later years, ministered in New England, with gifts of the highest culture fully matured, and an ample response from those most influential in the best life of that community.

Dr. CROTHERS is very far from being an old man yet, and we cannot think that he will ever grow old, for there is about him that brightness of perennial youth, which a frame finely compact, and an eager mind and heart bent on the highest service, and at home among beautiful and pure ideals, must retain to the end. We like to think of him as the "Happy Warrior" of the rising dawn of a new day, with wide horizon and the keen fresh air of liberty, with eager thought and the quick perceptions of pure spiritual insight, with generous ardour, and at the same time the finest humour, which is close akin to tenderness, champion of truth and justice, of large sympathies, rejoicing always in the widest human fellowship. WORDSWORTH has told us of "The Happy Warrior" and what we find in him:

"It is the generous Spirit, who, when brought
Among the tasks of real life, hath wrought
Upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought:
Whose high endeavours are an inward light
That makes the path before him always bright."

We have rejoiced in that brightness, which our friend has carried with him, wherever he has gone in our midst. We are the better for his visit, and shall cherish the memory of it till he comes again: We see more clearly what our religious life and work ought to be, and have more confidence that such work can be well and worthily done:

Of what was said at all those farewell meetings we can only attempt to record a part.

AT THE LAYMEN'S CLUB.

ON Friday week Dr. Crothers was the guest of the Laymen's Club at the Inns of Court Hotel, and after dinner gave an address on "Unitarian Laymen and their work in America." There were, he said, two great types of church organisation, that of the Catholic and the Established Church of England, and that of the Protestant, the Puritan and the modern Liberal. According to the former the clergy were essentially the Church, in the latter it was the whole body of the people who were the Church, and the minister was simply one member set apart for certain work, not different from others, except in special training, and the time given him to do the work which all wished to be done. And it was a remarkable fact that the great ages of the Christian Church had been ages when that was the real spirit of the Church. Even in the old Catholic Church, the men who directed it into new lines were for the most part men who had their training in secular lines of work. The first Apostles had been fishermen and other such, and among the Fathers, Augustine was a philosopher first, and Ambrose was a leading lawyer before he was made bishop. They were in touch with the secular life of their own time. And so the greatest of the Protestant Reformers, John Calvin, was not an ordained minister. He had written books of law, and was filled with the new thought of his own time before he was called to the care of the Church in Geneva. The ideal of their own movement was one in which the very best thought and purpose of the generation was expressed through the Church, which must be kept not in the line of the ecclesiastics, but of the people. It was their business to provide such leadership as they needed from among themselves; That was the spirit which they as Unitarians, in America, were proud to have inherited from English Puritanism. In the beginning of their churches the men were imbued with that spirit which, about the same time, was exhibited in the writings of John Milton. He had precisely the ideal of the Liberal Church, which they were now trying to build up, absolutely free from ecclesiasticism, of the people, not the priest. His was a splendid plea for that sort of Reformation, when the man in the street, the man in the ship, the layman, must resume the ill-deputed care of religion into his own hands, put his thought into it, and make his best thought felt. That was the spirit the first Puritans took over into America. There was never a people more full of religion, and more averse to priestcraft. The men of the Mayflower came to establish a religious commonwealth, but they brought no preacher with them. They had the Governor for their minister, and had their preaching and services at first without any separate ministerial officer. And the men of the next settlement at Salem and Boston were filled with the same idea. They did have ministers in time, but in that intensely religious community it was almost a hundred years before the ministers were allowed to take part in a marriage, which till then was performed by the civil authority. So strongly did they hold to the ideal that the people themselves are the Church. On that theory their old Unitarian Churches were founded, the theory of the Church as a body of citizens interested in the higher spiritual life of mankind, banded together for that work. The history of their community in New England showed that the strength of the churches had been in the lay element.

At the time of the Unitarian controversy, while the inner circle of the Church held to the orthodox ideals, the parish, or general body of the people, became Unitarian, and it was decided by the Courts that the real continuity of the Church lay with the parish, and not with the minister and communicants. So the body of laymen took the matter into their own hands, sometimes in spite of the minister, sometimes under his leadership. The periods of advance were always those when the churches were infused with the spirit of their own time, and worked for some needed reform of that time. The first Unitarian Church of New England illustrated that. King's Chapel, in Boston, was originally an Episcopal Church. Then came the reform which they celebrated on the Fourth of July, when the people took the matter of government into their own hands. It then became necessary to make changes in the liturgy at King's Chapel, and when the references to George III. were removed they at the same time dropped out the Trinity. That ferment of the spirit followed which led to a remarkable change in many of their churches, and brought them from the Puritan to the Unitarian name. It was something very largely human, led by persons not ordained ministers, but men of other callings, in the old University of Harvard, in the teaching of the professors, and then in the blossoming of their literature, in Emerson, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell—names associated with the liberal movement in thought. It was so remarkable that in histories of American literature they had chapters dealing with that period headed "The Unitarian Movement in Literature." Its spirit was expressed in Longfellow's description of his Theologian from the Cambridge Divinity School:—

"Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
Would help us in our utmost need.
With reverent feet the earth he trod,
Nor banished nature from his plan,
But studied still with deep research
To build the Universal Church,
Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the needs of man."

The Unitarian was part of the larger Transcendental movement of thought, and it was a happy fact that in that movement, starting from what they called the lay element, entirely unecclesiastical, they had a few men, among the ministers of the churches, intellectually and spiritually abreast of that current of thought, men like Channing and Parker, who were representative of that great free human movement. And when they spoke of the business men in that movement, the best thing that was done was at the beginning of Parker's career, when he was regarded by his clerical brethren as dangerous. At that moment, so critical for Unitarianism, when it was to be decided whether it should still lead the advance of thought, a body of business men met in Boston, and after discussing ways and means, resolved "That Theodore Parker shall be heard in Boston," and formed a new congregation for him there. And so Parker came to be safely canonised among the Unitarian saints. It was the rallying of the enlightened and courageous laymen of Boston which prevented the triumph of reaction. After that came another great human movement which reacted on Unitarianism and saved it again from sterility—the tremendous struggle for the emancipation of the slaves in the South. It threatened the moral life of the churches with the danger of compromise, for the business of the North was largely identified with the interests of the South, but happily in the majority of their churches conscience triumphed, and no amount of higher criticism did so much to break down the old orthodox ideas as that identification with the Anti-slavery cause. The great work of Starr King, who went as Unitarian minister to San Francisco at the time of the breaking out of the Civil War, and by his passionate eloquence practically saved California for the Union, gave to Unitarianism a position there such as it had nowhere else. He identified the Church with the great living interest of the day, and his name is memorable in California, before all others, for enlightened patriotism. After the great struggle of the war came a period of exhaustion and seeming decay, and again it was the laymen who lifted the churches on to a higher plane. The impulse came from the National Conference and the Laymen's Clubs. It was through the action of the Unitarian Club at Boston that the building of their present noble Unitarian headquarters was initiated, and for the younger men they had the Channing Club and others. The present development which seemed to him to have most promise in it was that which was organising their churches so as to be identified with the social life of the community. In his own parish at Cambridge they had a Social Service Committee. It was left entirely free to do any kind of good work, and its business was to study scientifically the state of the community, to get into touch with the best work that was being done, and never to duplicate by a separate society what was already being done in a larger undenominational way, but to go in and help that. They would ask, for instance, how their Church could best help the Associated Charities of Cambridge. Recently there had been a coal strike, and the first impulse was to raise a sum of money and give it to the poor. But the Social Service Committee spent several evenings considering the situation, and called in expert advice as to how they could best use their collective strength in that emergency. They were advised not to give all that money away, but to use it to furnish a new worker to the Associated Charities for six months. By that means they did more good in the long run, and received the thanks of the Charities of the city for doing what no other Church had done. That was how they tried to take their place in the life of the community. One Sunday morning they had left a little card in the pews, to find out what people were doing in any social work, and they found that in that congregation 49 different societies were represented, and that 42 of their members were on the official boards of those institutions. And now they got these people to tell their needs to the congregation, to enlist more help. After morning service they had another hour, when they invited those who had any help for the grievances of society to tell the congregation what they might do in the way of practical good work. And the men of the congregation, as a whole, stayed for that second hour to discuss ways and means for social salvation. That was the present line of enthusiasm in their Church.

In conclusion, Dr. Crothers said they had in their American life fearful problems: there was the race question, and trusts, and the enormous emigration of untrained citizens from Europe. And he thought all the churches had of late made a radical departure from old methods in throwing aside sectarianism, and banding together for great causes, in common citizenship. In Cambridge they had an association of all the Protestant Churches, which met, without regard to denominational affiliation, to use the forces of the Church as a unity to work for common special ends. That was a movement that was going to be felt in their American life. At the heart of the nation, in spite of the great Trusts, there was a tremendous struggle for the Puritan type of character and life. President Roosevelt was the best type of the new American, preaching simplicity of life and justice. It was that ideal side of his character which was now the secret of his popularity and strength. During the next twenty-five years he believed the whole tone of life would be changed by the splendid efforts of such men, making for the regeneration of business and politics and social life, from evils, which in the immediate past had overclouded the American democracy. They could not say anything about the evils of American life half as energetic as people over there were saying. The reason why they heard so much about the evils was that they were being remorselessly investigated and held up to the scorn of the people. Light must be let into the dark places, and that would show them the way out.

The President of the Club, Mr. HAROLD WADE, Mr. HERBERT LAWFORD, and the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE having earlier in the evening spoken in warm appreciation of Dr. Crothers' visit, and with the heartiest good wishes in bidding him farewell, urged at the same time the need of vigorous support for the Boston Conference Fund, which Dr. Herbert Smith was prevented by illness from further prosecuting; and Dr. Crothers subsequently added a warm endorsement of that plea, saying that it was of the greatest importance that a large delegation should attend the Conference next year, to secure its international character. They hoped to make it a notable gathering, in which not only Unitarian but other Liberal Churches in America would take part, and that it would mark an epoch in their religious life.

AT ESSEX CHURCH.

Dr. Crothers' last services at Essex Church fell on Citizen Sunday, and his sermons were on themes suggested by the day. Some account of them we shall hope to give next week.

On Monday evening a congregational soiree was held in the schoolroom to bid farewell to Dr. and Mrs. Crothers and their family.

Mr. W. WALLACE BRUCE presided, and paid a warm tribute to Dr. Crothers as an eloquent preacher and a charming personality. Of what he further said as to close affinities between his own family and that of Dr. Crothers we have already spoken. He asked Dr. Crothers to take back a message to the churches on the other side of the Atlantic of friendship and sympathy in their common efforts after freedom.

Mrs. FREESTON then presented to Mrs. Crothers a beautiful bouquet as a token of friendship from the ladies of the congregation. Miss M. Bruce made a gift to Miss Crothers from the younger members, and Mr Bruce said they were asking Dr. Crothers to accept as a memento of his visit an album of views of the church; but this was not yet forthcoming as some of the negatives were in Mr. Freeston's keeping, and it must wait his return and be sent afterwards.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS added words of gratitude and appreciation on behalf of brother ministers in London.

Dr. CROTHERS gratefully acknowledged the gifts, and said that he could not tell them what those six months had meant to him, in enlarging his understanding of England and English people, and particularly of Unitarian English people. It had shown him how little the two nations, so closely allied, really knew of each other. The America of which they heard in the newspapers was not the real America, it was not that which the American meant when he sang to the same tune as their "God Save the King,"

"My country, 'tis of thee, Sweet land of liberty."

It was not the country of Trusts, of the eager scramble for wealth, which they saw when they first landed. New York was not America at all, but a great seething caldron, the entrance through which the new millions came, the great unassimilated multitudes, of all nationalities, who had still to learn the English language and the history of republican institutions. There was room for them all in the country, and there they must look for the true America. There the people were living simple, God-fearing lives, with very little bustle, perhaps with not quite enough of it—a great conservative, rural population: That which united the two countries, and particularly their own household of faith in the two countries, was the ideal struggle to make that country into one great national power, of order, law, and righteousness. It was yet in the making, continually in the making. That was what the people who were working for religion and education had in view. The term Yankee was often used, and wrongly used, of Americans as a whole. He did not know what it meant, but its origin was probably Indian. It was used by the Dutch of New York to describe the Puritans of New England, and it was to them, whatever it meant, that it strictly applied. The typical Yankee was one with the typical English Nonconformist. If they went back to the politics of the sixteenth and seventeenth century they would find him there described as the typical Puritan, even to the twang in his speech. In the great turmoil and confusion of races in America that sturdy Nonconformist Puritan type increased and multiplied. It spread away across the Hudson, clear across to the Pacific, till the one dominant strain in the North was associated with the whole country. And they who were not Yankees were glad to be absorbed into that conquering strain. And it was just that same type of religion which Essex Church represented. Their history had been the same, passing from the old Calvinism to the Arian, and then the frankly Unitarian position. The more he had been about in England the more had he been impressed by that identity of type. There had been the same intellectual and spiritual development, and the more they knew of one another, the more would they be conscious of that union. Their differences were not in essentials. In conclusion, he thanked them for the unmeasured hospitality which had been shown to them. As a family of seven they could best put their feeling into the words of their small boy of four, who had written home in a brief letter: "I like England and I like America." The memories they took back would be a delight to them all their days.

Dr. Crothers added a word as to the International meeting in Boston next year. He remembered the first meeting in London, five years ago, as the most inspiring time of his life, and he had got so much good from his experience in coming to England that he wanted as many English ministers as possible to have the opportunity of coming to the Boston meeting. It would be an opportunity of seeing them at their best, and not their own little body alone, but kindred bodies throughout the country. They wanted as many as possible, both of ministers and laymen, to be there.

AT ESSEX HALL.

Over the Farewell meeting at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, presided. The President wrote greatly regretting his unavoidable absence, and a hundred other letters of regret had been received. There was, in spite of the inclement evening, a very good attendance.

The CHAIRMAN said their word to Dr. Crothers should be not "Good-bye," but Auf Wiedersehen. Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., and Mr. C. F. PEARSON, the ex-President, joined in expressions of admiration and gratitude.

Dr. CROTHERS, in response, said that better even than dying and coming to life again to read one's obituary, was simply to go from home and spend six months in England, to so get the obituaries fresh, and have a happy time remembering all the pleasant things said about one. Of course he didn't believe them all; but it was very pleasant. He thought there was no place where a minister was more sure of having his words do what he wished them to do than in England. It was hard for him to think that it was not quite six months since he came. At the end of that time he could no longer say you, but only we, and he could hardly think of their Unitarian churches as belonging to two nations, but—as in fact they did—to one great English-speaking community round the world. He had found in going about that the same things he felt like saying in America he felt like saying here, with a little different emphasis, perhaps, in different circumstances, but essentially their religious work and opportunity was the same. The one thing that came to him more and more was the fact that their Unitarian churches were really entering on a new and very much larger opportunity than they had ever had before. For them as truly as for the Orthodox, the old things were passing away. They often talked, and sometimes thought, that it was only the orthodox churches that had changed and broadened; and they sometimes talked in a way rather offensive to their orthodox friends about "their coming to us," as if a long time ago the Unitarian churches had somehow found the final truth in regard to religion, the larger and better way, and the whole evolution of the time was towards that position. That, he thought, was not true. The Unitarianism of the venerated fathers of the faith, the particular type of thought and feeling they represented, had passed away just as that of their opponents had. What they had really received from them, their really great inheritance was liberty to take the next step, the freedom for which they contended. That was what gave them their great advantage in meeting the thought and the difficulties of the present time. A century ago orthodoxy and dissent were altogether individualistic, concerning persons who could live altogether apart from society. Now the whole trend of feeling and thought was towards the idea of solidarity of the race, that no man could be saved alone, no man could find truth alone. What did that mean for them? The high churchmen of the Establishment, in whom they saw something very vital, whatever their failure intellectually, had a certain idea of the solidarity of society, and were working with all classes to build up a great spiritual institution. They, as Unitarians, without giving up their inheritance, rather emphasising it, had now the opportunity to get hold of the Catholic ideal, the spiritual counterpart of the social ideal of the time. The ideal of the church, in America, and he thought here also, Unitarians had minimised, the idea of organised religion, because they had had to fight against a kind of organisation inimical to freedom of thought. They must now emphasise the organisation of the individual church, and the group of churches of their own order, and the larger group of all the churches of Christendom, not of the old ecclesiasticism and priesthood, but the fascinating problem for them as ministers and members was really to show the possibility of an efficient, fruitful organisation of intelligence, freedom, and the humane principles of life, and make their churches full of just that spirit. They saw absolutely no contradiction between the ideals of men like Martineau and Channing, who disliked the narrower type of denominationalism and sectarianism, and would not be bound by sectarian bonds, and the spirit of those who wanted an efficient brotherhood, to bring the churches together and make them work together, not on narrow, but the broadest lines. That was the most encouraging thing in their churches both here and in America, that those most loyal to the ideal of perfect spiritual and intellectual liberty were the persons most active in the attempt to make the Churches efficient organs of the spiritual life. For himself, he should go back greatly encouraged by what he had seen in this country; and speaking, in conclusion, of his own country, he asked them if they did not like every American, yet to believe in America, as to-day, as in the past, representative not of the mere haste for wealth, but of the things for which they also cared the most, and above all of a very deep ideal purpose. In both countries it was the great multitude of quiet people who were working to build up the same ideals, to make a nation based on liberty and justice, moving steadily and slowly, too slowly, it might be, yet always moving towards those great ideals which made the real worth of human life. Everywhere it was the people, comparatively unknown, who in the end were influential, and were really typical of the nation; and they ought to know each other and believe in each other. If those visits of ministers on either side, who came and found the same conditions in both countries, meant anything, they meant simply that unity of the spirit, which after all was the essential thing for them all. In saying farewell, it was with the hope and deep desire that they might see each other soon again.

Two admirable photographs of Dr. Crothers, taken in Birmingham this summer by Messrs. H. J. Whitlock & Sons (11, New-street), will be welcomed, we feel sure, by friends in many parts of the country, who have felt the stimulus of his lectures and addresses, and the rare charm of his presence. The photographs are of cabinet size, on a dark bevelled mount (10 in. by 7 in.), price 2s. each, postage 2d. It is difficult to choose between the two. One likes to look straight into the eyes of the full face picture, but the side face is also very fine, and we have heard it preferred to the other. Both is the best choice that friends can make! Order direct from Birmingham.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Mr. C. F. Pearson, the ex-President, in the absence of the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, being in the chair. The other members present were Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. Aspland, Mrs. Bartram, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Miss Brock, Miss Burkitt, Mr. Capleton, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Miss Clephan, Rev. V. D. Davis, Rev. E. S. Hicks, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. B. Lewis, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. W. Long, Mrs. W. G. Mace, Mr. D. Martineau, Rev. H. W. Perris, Rev. W. C. Pope, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. H. Rawlings, Rev. C. Roper, Mrs. H. Rutt, Rev. L. Scott, Miss E. Sharpe, Rev. T. P. Spedding, Mr. Stannus, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Tayler, Rev. E. Turland, Mr. Tyssen, Mr. Harold Wade, Mr. J. C. Warren, and the Secretary (the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

Mr. PEARSON, in taking the chair, explained that the President greatly regretted his inability to be present, but he was claimed at Leeds by the marriage of his daughter.

The minutes of the last meeting of the Council, on March 28, were read and confirmed.

The Secretary read the report of the executive committee, which will be printed in full in next week's INQUIRER. The report included a record of losses through the death of members of the Association:—Mr. William Colfox of Bridport, Dr. Cameron of Liverpool, Mr. A. Curren Briggs of Leeds, Mrs. George Buckton of Oxford, Mr. A. M. Bose of Calcutta, Rev. J. C. Woods of Adelaide, and also of Professor Albert Réville of Paris. A resolution of commemoration and of sympathy with the relatives, moved by Mr. A. D. Tyssen and seconded by Mr. Ion Pritchard, was passed in reverent silence.

Mr. PRITCHARD spoke especially of Mr. Colfox's constant interest in the work of the Association and the welfare of our churches generally, and of their close connection with Mr. Bose, through the administration of the Indian Famine Fund of six years ago:

Questions on matters referred to in the report followed: Mr. LEWIS suggested that the Foreign Committee ought now to be known as "Foreign and Colonial." Mr. CAPLETON gave some interesting particulars, which he had received, as to the Unitarian Society in Japan: At their Sunday meetings, he said, they had an attendance of about 400, with two or three addresses each day, but no hymns and little music.

Mr. TURLAND spoke hopefully of the Hobart congregation, and urged special attention to the churches in Wales. He pleaded also for Welsh services in London: Miss SHARPE urged that more might be done for the study of the Bible. Mr. TARRANT said he did not think people generally knew how much help for that study was provided by the publications especially of the Sunday School Association. He agreed that much admirable help was also furnished by others.

THE UNITARIAN VAN.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING then gave an address on the Unitarian Van Mission. He was glad that matter should be noticed by the Council. What he offered was a digest of the full report to be published shortly by the Committee of the Missionary Conference, who had directed the Mission. During the past summer the van had been 163 days on the road, and 139 evening meetings had been held, besides a few other meetings in the dinner-hour at mill gates, and for children before the adult meetings. The attendance had been very gratifying. As regards figures, their estimate on one occasion at Todmorden had been since called in question, but he wished to say that several times the visiting ministers had protested that Mr. Talbot's estimate was below rather than over the mark, and he had been very careful in his reckoning. The total attendance of adults they estimated at 20,000, not counting children and youths; the actual total of their counting was 24,612. There were bound to be discrepancies in such reckoning, but he believed they were under the mark. They made the mistake of going on rather too late in the season, or their average would have been higher. It worked out as 176 per meeting. Of the 139 meetings, 63 fell below 100, 28 under 50; but it must be remembered that some were in villages. They had over 50 with more than 250, and 5 of 900 and upwards: The Mission was conducted by twenty-two ministers pledged to it from the beginning, and all along others came in to help, so that altogether fifty were associated with it, some attending many times. Mr. Ceredig Jones and his choir rendered specially valuable help. They were grateful to the Association for their grant of £10 and a mass of literature, which had been very widely used and appreciated. The questions asked at the meetings were mostly of a very orthodox kind; only one or two were hostile to religion. He felt the great importance of counteracting the deadening influence of such teaching as that of Nunquam among the people, and he believed they could do much good in that direction. In their addresses they had never of set purpose been controversial, though always ready to answer questions. In this the people had shown the utmost eagerness, but the meetings had never become a wrangle.

As to cost, they had spent during the summer about £250. The actual expenses of twenty-two weeks in the field had been £94—something over £4 a week, 11s. 7d. a day. Other expenses of organisation, general equipment, &c., brought the total daily average cost to 15s. 7½d.; but after this first year's experience that would be reduced, and he hoped it would not in future prove to be more than 11s. a day. Their first donation of £150 from "Friend B." they might now say was from Mrs. Bayle Bernard. Less than a hundred other subscribers had furnished £117, and the earnings of the Van brought the total income up to £291. They only once had a set collection, but they had two little boxes for donations in the Van, which, when more attention was called to them during the last fortnight, produced £4 10s. They had now £35 in hand towards next year's campaign; but they wanted a great deal more help, for the work was to be greatly extended. Sir John Brunner and Sir E. Durning-Lawrence had promised them a second Van, and they hoped to have four for next summer, and needed an income of £500. They recognised that it was a great opportunity, a much-needed work of propagandism, but not of proselytism. The effect on their own ministers had been most remarkable, and he believed it would be so in other parts of the country also. They were following up the summer's work, and, especially in Yorkshire, were hopeful of permanent results. In Manchester they were planning a winter campaign. Their visitors' book contained 883 names, the majority of whom were doubtless Unitarians. They had heard of nine districts in various parts of the country where a Van was wanted. In the development of that work he thought it would be best for the Vans to belong to one society. It certainly would save waste. They were trusting that the Association would give them generous support.

The Rev. W. C. POPE moved, and Mr. WILLIAM LONG seconded, a resolution, which, as slightly modified on the suggestion of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, ran as follows:—

"That the Rev. T. P. Spedding be heartily congratulated upon his report, and that it be referred to the Executive Committee to take into consideration, and, in consultation with those immediately concerned, to devise means for carrying on the Unitarian Van movement in an effective and efficient way, so that full advantage may be taken of the opportunities which now present themselves in all parts of the country for Unitarian missionary work."

Mr. LONG told of his own experience at an early meeting in the neighbourhood of Warrington, and how he had been impressed by the opportunity the van afforded of getting into touch with the working people. He had been doubtful as to the Mission when it was first proposed, but he now believed it could do great good. What they wanted was more Mr. Speddings.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU expressed hearty sympathy with the work, and gratitude to Mr. Spedding for having initiated it. He had seen a similar result, in its effect on the ministers, at the beginning of their Mission at Bermondsey. As to that new Mission, no doubt the money would be found. A greater difficulty would be the men, if they got four Vans. They would have to develop the talent of their young laymen.

Miss CLEPHAN also expressed great interest in the Mission. It had not got to make Unitarians; they were there already. It had to show the people that they were Unitarians. She was inclined to think that they would do better without chapels, and should stay out in the open.

The Rev. H. RAWLINGS spoke of the special needs of London, and thought that in some outlying districts the Van would do better service than some of their new movements in halls and churches.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

Mr. RONALD BARTRAM then moved:—

"That this meeting urges the members of the Association throughout the country to watch carefully the action of the bishops and the peers in the House of Lords in respect to the Education Bill, and to co-operate with their fellow-citizens in resisting every attempt to impose theological tests upon teachers or to place the cost of denominational religious teaching upon public funds."

This was seconded by Miss CLEPHAN, supported by Miss BROCK, and passed.

This concluded the business of the Council.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE IN AMERICA.

By GEO. CROSWELL CRESSEY, D.D.

A FEW words may not be untimely concerning the prosperous condition of so-called Christian Science in the United States, to which reference was made in a recent article in THE INQUIRER.

First of all, we must regret the tendency—in America, at least—to designate indiscriminately all theories which assert the ability of mind to control matter as Christian Science.

There are in the United States many adherents of "Mental Health" or "Metaphysical Healing" who are not followers of Mrs. Eddy, and have no use whatever for the text-book "Science and Health"—a work apparently occupying an equal place with the Bible in the Christian Scientist services of worship and instruction. These believers in mental health, though they form occasionally religious societies of their own, are for the most part in churches of various denominations, many of them in liberal congregations, and many also directly connected with no religious organisation. In general, they may be said to bear the same relation to Christian Scientists as liberal to so-called evangelical Christians. They are broad in fellowship, recognising Christian Science as embodying truth, while they deprecate the narrowness of its spirit. The followers of the latter, on the other hand, will affiliate in no way with believers in Mental Health, nor, indeed, with any religious organisation; in fact, they seem to neglect no opportunity to assert that Mrs. Eddy's precepts are the sole source and expression of the supreme power of mind or spirit.

It is obvious, of course, that, whatever cures may be effected by Christian Scientist or metaphysical healer, the working principle is the same, and that the exercise of this principle, though we may not be able to define its possibilities, requirements, or limitations, is independent of any narrow adherence to personal leadership or dogmatic mysticism. In no branch of human thought, in truth—unless it be in the attempted metaphysics of some physical scientists—can be found more undeniable bondage to words and phrases which are beyond definition and intelligible explanation.

There are several causes of the growth and prosperity of this latest sect of Christendom—and "sect" it is in the full and literal meaning of the term. First, it flourishes through the truth it contains—and, I may add, often conceals. It is a striking illustration of the fact, apparent in all Christian history, that a small foundation of truth will support a vast fabric of error, and that this same truth held as a profound conviction will exert more influence than a logical system containing far more truth held as a mere theory or even as a belief.

Another reason for its success lies in its convenience as a refuge from materialism. It is thus a sort of protest against the materialistic spirit of the age, and to this extent it may have our sympathy. The path to an extreme is easier to many minds than the road of calm reason. To some one extreme seems the only refuge from the other.

A third cause is found in the reaction against rigid orthodoxy. I have known many no longer able to accept evangelical doctrine, who have sought escape in the mists of "science," as it is boastfully called. Especially it claims to explain the miracles of the New Testament with no violation of physical law, since this has ceased to exist for it, theoretically; and with its capacity to read symbolism into any passage of scripture it may free itself easily from any inharmonious doctrine.

The last of the principal causes is one of the most efficient—satisfaction in combining the spiritual and physical, the clergyman and physician. There is a peculiar pleasure in finding in one's religion a cure for all physical ill. It may be stigmatised as an appeal to selfishness, yet it is legitimate enough if it were justified by experience. I regret to add, however, that it is a common observation that Christian Science teachings do not seem to deepen human sympathy, or tend to visible effort in philanthropy.

The rambling, inconsistent, and often unintelligible maxims of Christian Science can hardly be termed a philosophy of life; yet, so far as it may be regarded as such, its character is well illustrated by its treatment of the problem of evil. It essays to shunt the whole question by denying the existence of matter, pain, and disease; at the same time it brings it back in the lump in the form of illusion and error, which, being universal, have all the effects of reality. Why this illusion and error should be imposed on mankind it does not deign to offer the slightest explanation.

The movement is still young, and its final developments are to come. Mrs.

Eddy, by her shrewd prohibition of the sermon in public service, and, for the most part, of all comment on "Science and Health," has prevented, thus far, division and party in the organisation. Whether this will continue, and what will be the ultimate fate of the movement, are questions of the future.

ISOLATED CHURCHES.—CARLISLE.

SIR,—The Leeds Conference discussion on missionary enterprise is most stimulating reading, and makes one doubly regret an enforced absence. I wish, with your permission, to emphasise one or two points which arose during the Conference. My predecessor in the ministry at Carlisle, Mr. Travers, spoke of the "grave wrong" of establishing an outpost like this, and said that without adequate support from the main body of the army it was a "forlorn hope."

Mr. Travers is largely right. It is a grave wrong to place the responsibility of maintaining a rather costly structure, and of paying the salary of a settled minister upon a group of working people, even when aided by a £50 grant from the B. & F. U. A., and the independence of such a congregation is "a forlorn hope" indeed, so long as that policy is continued. The reasons for this are plain. In such a community business acumen and capacity for responsible leadership are often lacking, and the minister, who should be a shepherd of souls, finds half his time absorbed in devising expedients for extracting reluctant pence from the pockets of his people. The spectre of a deficit haunts him; and, if the people think, it haunts them likewise, and the result is that the higher ministry of the church is lost sight of in a sordid struggle for mere existence. I confess that rather than demean my ideal of the ministry by becoming a professional beggar I would prefer to earn my living at some lay occupation, and give the rest of my time to the service of religion.

A great burden of responsibility rests upon those who organise new churches such as this at Carlisle. At first, of course, there was much enthusiasm, and many handsome subscriptions from outside. In recent years these have largely fallen away—for people tire of giving to a cause whose work they are not familiar with—and the church has suffered grievous losses by the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Arlosh and Mr. David Ainsworth. At this moment the congregation is straining every nerve to avoid a deficit of £30 on the current year's balance sheet. Next year the threatened deficit will be twice this sum. These are mere trifles to a wealthy church, but to a church consciously battling for existence they represent a crushing burden. Add to this our chilling isolation (we are over fifty miles from our nearest neighbours), and the fact that we are anathematised by the clergy of this cathedral city, and your readers will be able, in part, to understand why two or three years' work here is calculated to break down the strength of the strongest. Two courses are open to us as a denomination:—

(1) To recognise that places like Carlisle are "a forlorn hope," and give up. Such a course is worthy of children and of cowards. Where there are eighty or ninety people willing to be called by the Unitarian name, and more children seeking instruction in the Sunday school, it would be to our lasting shame to haul down the flag.

(2) We must therefore organise our missionary forces in such a way that adequate support can be given to such stations as these. In the absence of such an organisation I am compelled to appeal for aid to all who have at any time been interested in our particular movement at Carlisle; but for my part I would rather see a central board, representative of all our churches, endowed with power to administer all missionary funds, to place men in suitable centres, and to guarantee their salaries, receiving from the missions such contributions as they can afford. I am convinced that this can be done without in the least degree violating our rightly prized freedom; and until something like it is done I can see no end to the sordid struggle which is sapping the spiritual life of some of our poorer churches.

But, meanwhile, shall we follow the policy of "concentration" or of "diffusion"?

We are in duty bound to do both. Our duty is not primarily to found churches, but to spread abroad religious truth and reverent freedom. There is no need to talk of lopping off the little old congregations, or the struggling new ones. The entire question is one for comprehensive and sympathetic administration by a representative board, who should utilise the local unions for building up self-supporting churches, the van missions for breaking new ground and scattering the seed broadcast, and a supplementary circuit and itinerant ministry for meeting the needs of small groups of worshippers where the geographical and other conditions lend themselves to this type of oversight.

But first we must get our representative missionary board. If our newly awakened zeal should lead us to that it will produce a permanent benefit. Meanwhile, I beg of our rich friends not to condemn us who go out into the wilderness to spiritual inefficiency and actual physical want.

ALBERT THORNHILL.

Carlisle, Oct. 30, 1906.

A CHURCH FOR THE SOLITARY.

SIR,—During the last few weeks the successive issues of the INQUIRER have been singularly full of enthusiastic reports and plans of work in our churches and colleges. A most courageous and hopeful spirit pervades both. Yet, amongst all that is being done in town and country I see no reference to the isolated members of our community, whom necessity drives into out of the way spots.

There is splendid work being done by the Postal Mission to meet the needs of outsiders, but in what way are our ministers and laymen striving to keep staunch members who have drifted far from the ministrations of our churches?

For six years I have only been within reach of an Unitarian church on three Sundays in the year. I am somewhat more fortunately placed now in having the opportunity at intervals of about three months. How many people under such circumstances, from sheer loneliness of spirit, would seek the beauty of the Established Church, or the hearty fellowship of Wesleyan, Congregational, or Methodist Chapel?

As a descendant of a Huguenot on one side and an ejected minister on the other, loyalty to my forefathers and the memory of earlier teachings in some of our finest churches have kept me staunch. I am speaking for those others less fortunate than myself in having no strong bias.

Who cares if we lonely folk accept what our neighbours offer of spiritual comfort? When the stress of daily life causes our spirits to fail there is no minister or church to revive us. No one apparently needs us scattered atoms in the Unitarian community. With all your great enthusiasm can nothing be done for us? So little would make a difference. The right hand of fellowship stretched out through the post would give us fresh heart not to desert the church which has cost so many sacrifices. I can only keep in touch with this church life by reading the INQUIRER each week, and it leaves a sore feeling of being outside all the strenuous work. Members of the Established Church can read their prayer book at stated hours and worship in spirit with thousands of others. The freedom of our churches does not permit of one form of worship for all, but would it not be possible for the isolated folk to adopt one, frequently changed if desired, that they may worship together in spirit?

In the name of all such I ask who will minister to us?

K. H. SMITH.

Southwold, Suffolk.

[What our correspondent says only points once more to the need of organising such a "Church for the Unattached" as Mr. Bowie wrote of in the INQUIRER of January 7, 1905, describing the work of the "Unitarian Church of All Souls," organised by Mr. Channing Brown of Littleton, Mass. The minister of such a church would offer to send out every week by post a leaflet or sermon to all the scattered members, and they might agree also to use some common book of prayer, while he could offer by letter the ministry of sympathy wherever there was special need. Such a church, of course, would require an income to cover the cost of literature and postage, and the members ought all to subscribe. We have an impression that an offer of the kind was made by the district minister in Yorkshire. Perhaps we shall hear more of it in his next Provincial Letter.—ED. INQ.]

"JOHN POUNDS" COTTAGE.

8, NETLEY TERRACE, SOUTHSEA.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to call attention to the pressing needs of the "John Pounds" Cottage, a home in which destitute girls, and some others, are assisted to enter domestic service.

During the last two years our work has increased so much that our six beds have been insufficient, and delay in admitting suitable applicants has been unavoidable. Since the end of March, 22 girls have been placed in situations, and the greater number are doing well, so far this year we have only had two apparent failures. These girls usually come to us without one garment fit for service, and we find that it is impossible to provide a respectable outfit, including box, for less than £4 16s.

During the summer and autumn months we receive little clothing, and were it not that many ladies have been good enough to join our Clothing Guild, and to send us old garments, we could not have carried on the work. Already, since March, £70 has been spent in outfitting; of this the girls themselves have repaid £31 11s. 6d., which is cheering evidence that they realise in a measure that our object is to help them to help themselves, not to pauperise them. Our expenditure last year amounted to £198 1s. 10½d., our yearly subscriptions were £73 11s. 6d., and donations £94 8s.

The great distress in Portsmouth, arising from want of work, makes us particularly busy now, and we look forward to the winter with much anxiety, begging our friends to help us with necessary means to give these poor girls the chance of becoming useful, self-respecting women, instead of being, which is, alas, often the case, a disgrace to our twentieth century Christianity.

Hon. Sec.

COAL MINING PROFITS.

SIR,—Perhaps the following data, based on Board of Trade and other official documents, will interest your correspondent and those who imagine that owners of coal mines or royalties gain huge profits at the expense of the workers.

RICHARD SIMON.

1886-1900. Tons of coal raised, 2,802,395,000; value at pit's mouth, £953,477,000; average, 6s. 9-65d. per ton. Paid in wages, £642,386,000; average, 4s. 7-01d. per ton. Average weekly wage per man and boy, the year round, 26s. 11d. Mining royalties are estimated by the Board of Trade to have averaged sixpence per ton during the above period. The Inland Revenue returns put them at 5½d. They have probably increased somewhat since then.

Owners' profits, spread over a period of 31 years, which is the average length of mining leases, are estimated at not more than 6d. per ton, which is equal to a dividend of 5 per cent. on the capital invested; but as 2 per cent. should be deducted for sinking fund, the actual return is only 3 per cent. Miners' wages being generally regulated by sliding scales based on past profits, are often low when prices are high, and high when prices are low.

A WARNING.

SIR,—Will you allow me to warn your readers, especially ministers and missionaries, against a man named J. L. Saunders, who has associated himself for a short time with the Bell-street Mission and then absconded with funds belonging to the Mission in his possession. I give this warning, especially as I anticipate that he may attempt to establish a connection with some other mission.

SYDNEY H. STREET.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bath.—On Sunday evening the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie gave the second of the special course of lectures, his subject being: "Why I am a Unitarian." Mr. Blatchford's lecture on the previous Sunday has led to a correspondence in the Bath Herald, under the heading "A Real Free Church," particularly as to why Unitarians are excluded from the Evangelical Free Church Council.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The November calendar of Waverley-road Church (Minister, Rev. William C. Hall) announces the formation of two new institutions. On the first Sunday of last month what for the present will be styled the Men's Morning Meeting, was started. The meetings are held each Sunday an hour before morning service. After hymn and prayer, a short paper on some social, religious, or kindred subject is read, followed by free discussion. It is thought that this society will satisfy the need in the district for something a little distinct from the ordinary adult classes. On November 7th a monthly Wednesday Evening Service will be inaugurated. A liturgical form of worship compiled by the minister will be used; and he will at each service deliver a discourse intended primarily for senior scholars of the Sunday School and junior members of the church. The congregation as a whole, from whom the minister has received for some time past requests for an occasional week-night sermon, will be invited to join in the worship; and an attendance at least equal to that of an ordinary Sunday service is confidently expected.

Bradford.—On Oct. 25 a bazaar and fête were opened in the Channing Hall, in aid of the funds of Chapel Lane Chapel. Recent much-needed repairs have been carried out to the chapel property at Wilsden, and to meet the cost of this and of other exceptional expenses, an effort was made to raise a sum of £300. The opening ceremony was very largely attended, Mr. F. R. Pesel presiding. Sir E. Durning-Lawrence opened the bazaar, and spoke of the Chapel Lane Chapel as one of the historic churches of the Unitarian denomination. He referred to the fact that in 1662, in consequence of the Act of Uniformity, the vicar of Bradford was ejected from his church and was sent forth into the wilderness. This was really the foundation of that church, though it was ten years later that the members of the congregation secured permission to meet in the library of the house in which Sir Francis Sharp-Powell resides. Then in 1689, Parliament having awakened to the duty of granting religious freedom, the church secured a preaching licence. The first chapel on that site was built in 1719. Such a history was one for pride on the part of the congregation. They of the Unitarian faith believed they had a message to the world that no one else preached. On the motion of Mr. L. Badland, seconded by Mr. C. H. Ellis, thanks were accorded to Sir E. Durning-Lawrence and to the chairman for their services, and the Chairman, in responding, mentioned that he had been attending the services of the chapel for exactly fifty years. The bazaar was reopened on Friday, October 26, by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones presided. Saturday, the 27th, was the children's day, and a very large audience assembled to witness the opening ceremony. Master Frank Badland, a son of one of the wardens, occupied the chair, and after his neat opening speech, eight little girls dressed in white, each representing a flower, recited a verse each, and then all said one verse together, in which they declared the bazaar open. This was followed by the presentation of purses of money, amounting to nearly £9, collected by the children. That night it was found that the gross results for the three days amounted to £266, which, by subsequent sales, has been increased to £285.

Brighton.—The anniversary services at Christ Church, New-road, were conducted by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn on Sunday, October 21, and on the following evening the annual congregational meeting was held. Mr. Daplyn was warmly thanked for his services, and the Rev. Priestley Prime gave a hopeful address on the condition and future of the church. It was, he said, progressing in all departments of church work. Not only was the average attendance at church increasing, but the interest people were taking in the church was increasing. It was growing more and more as a centre of worship, of social service, without the attraction of entertainments, of music, dancing, and so on. Entertainments were good things in their place; but he held that their place in church life came after the congregation had been drawn together, not as a means of drawing them together. The reproach of not taking keen interest in social questions could not be laid against Christ Church. Sunday after Sunday they had dealt with such topics; they never hesitated to attempt to apply the glorious truths of Christianity to everyday affairs. They could best express their love of God by their service to man. God was not a jealous God, but a God of love. He proposed to examine our social institutions and methods of life, and to see how they bore the survey that came from a religious standpoint—that of a man trying to be in touch with God. The Revs. E. Daplyn and J. Felstead, and Mr. Wilmthurst also spoke. Mr. W. Slatter, in a retrospect in the New road Monthly, tells of the origin of the congregation from a protest on the subject of universal salvation, which led to other doctrinal questionings. "I think," he writes, "the first place of meeting for worship was in a disused carpenter's shop in Jew-street, Church-street, Brighton, under the leadership of Mr. Stevens for some years. Their next place of worship was in Cavendish-street, from which they removed to the present beautiful building in New-road. This building was erected under the auspices of Dr. Morrel, a Greek scholar. The building is Greek in all its proportions. The ministers who succeeded Dr. Morrel during the last seventy-seven years were Mr. Mallison, Mr. Ainslie, Mr. Dobson, Mr. Hood, Mr. Livens, and our present highly esteemed minister, Mr. Priestley Prime."

Flagg.—Harvest Festival services were held at this little High Peak hamlet on Sunday last, the preacher being the Rev. G. Street, of Buxton. Mr. Street has a week evening-class here of between thirty and forty young people; and, in addition, he is just starting a second class in the neighbouring village of Pomeroy. Here the proprietor of the village inn, has given the free use of a room, and a working-man in the village has volunteered to play the harmonium.

Halifax.—The 48th annual tea and entertainment was held on Saturday, Oct. 27. After tea Mr. Arnold H. Wadsworth was in the chair, and the report was read, showing a small increase in membership, and nine prizes were distributed to members for reciting at the monthly meetings. The Rev. H. Fisher Short, in a few words, strongly encouraged the young people to adhere to total abstinence. A musical cantata, entitled "New Year's Eve," was very well done by the members.

London: Ilford.—On Oct. 27 a combined social evening and general meeting was held in the Broadway Assembly Room, and was in every way a success. Mr. Walter D. Welford was re-elected hon. secretary and Mr. E. R. Fyson hon. treasurer. The committee was also appointed. It was decided that the church should be known as the "Ilford Unitarian Christian Church," and the rules, consisting of three only, were adopted. The time of meeting was altered from 6.30 to 7 p.m. The reports of the Secretary and Treasurer respectively were deemed eminently satisfactory. Every effort is being made to obtain a plot of ground upon which to build, as the Hon. Secretary stated in his report, "a little chapel of our own, tin, iron, or whatever you may choose to call it, but (and oh, such a big but) our own." A land fund has been started; some of the ladies are moving in the matter, and various schemes are being mooted. The plot of land chosen is in a splendid position, £300 freehold, and of ample size. The usual votes of thanks to the officers were passed, one to the Provincial Assembly for their kind assistance, and a special one to the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The annual Parents' Party was held last week, when there was a good attendance of parents and elder scholars. There was a good programme of music, and addresses were given by the Revs. C. Peach, W. Holmshaw, Councillor Pritchard, J.P., and Mr. A. Dugdale, jun.

Walsley: Bolton.—Saturday afternoon last saw the realisation of a long-felt want in connection with Walsley Unitarian Chapel. For some time past the Sunday-school has been inadequate for the demands made upon it both on Sundays and for social functions, and about twelve months ago it was decided to enlarge it. This was done last summer, and the new building was opened on Saturday by Mrs. Haslam, of White Bank, Bolton. With the object of raising part of £300 still required to free the building from debt, the opening ceremony was followed by a bazaar. Mrs. Haslam, in declaring the school open, referred to the visits she paid to the different chapels in the district and the changes of the last 50 years. She said that the most valuable help that could be given to children was that towards character-forming, and it seemed to her that there was nothing more powerful in that direction than the personality of the Sunday-school teacher and the friendships fostered between the teacher and the class. She was followed by Mr. D. Healey, the Rev. Morgan Jones, Mr. Andrews Crompton, and the Rev. W. Harris. Mr. L. Cropper moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Haslam, which was seconded by Mr. J. B. Gass, who also presented Mrs. Haslam with a handsomely framed photograph of the chapel and school, as a memento of the occasion. On behalf of Mrs. Farrar, of Sharples, the Rev. E. E. Jenkins presented the trustees of the chapel with a beautiful oil painting of Yearnsdale Holmes with the "preacher's rock," where their nonconforming ancestors used to meet under cover of night before the days of religious liberty, and to worship their God in their own simple way. Mr. Jenkins expressed their deep gratitude to Mrs. Farrar for her valuable gift. On Monday, October 29, the bazaar was re-opened by Mrs. Cooper, of Eagle Brow. Mr. John Lawson presided. The proceeds of the bazaar realised about £160.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONE other holiday sermon of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's we still have, on "Iceland," which we shall hope to publish a fortnight hence, in addition to that on "Niagara" which appears this week.

THE report of the Executive Committee to the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be found in our present issue. The proceedings of the council meeting on Oct. 30 we reported last week.

THE Rev. F. K. Freeston is safe home again, after his visit to America, and his two months' preaching at Cambridge, Mass., in exchange with Dr. Crothers. He landed on Wednesday of last week at Liverpool, after a rough passage, and is to preach at Essex Church to-morrow (Sunday) both morning and evening. We gather from various notices in the Christian Register that Mr. Freeston's presence in America was greatly appreciated by our kindred of the Liberal Faith over there. Noting a sermon of his at a meeting of the Young People's Religious Union, the Register, referring to his approaching return home, says: "Mr. Freeston will take back with him the affection and esteem of a large number of new friends and acquaintances on this side of the water." And the Rev. F. L. Phalen, of Fairhaven, Mass., writes to us in a similar strain, saying how invaluable are such ministerial exchanges for a better mutual understanding and encouragement, adding the hope that many English brethren will come over next year for the International meeting at Boston. Before Mr. Freeston left Cambridge a dinner in his honour was given by the Parish Club, when farewells were said to him by the president, Dr. Edward Hall, President Eliot, of Harvard University, and others. References to two sermons of Mr. Freeston's on "Symbolism in Religion" gave rise to an animated discussion, in which President Eliot and Mr. Freeston spoke from opposite points of view.

THE Evangelical Free Church demonstration on Monday left no room for doubt as to the strong feeling roused by the amendments to the Education Bill in the House of Lords. The noticeable features of the occasion included the growing exasperation and resentment resulting from the anomalous constitution of the Upper House and a plain declaration that Mr. Birrell's Bill itself was almost more than Nonconformists could endure by way of compromise. In regard to the former point some rather foolish talk took place, the suggestion being made that five hundred Liberal Peers should be created in order to pass the original Bill; but, probably, some of our friends will, on reflection, consider such a price too high for such a commodity. A more serious factor emerged in the hint that, after all, the "secular solution" will be found necessary. We do not think that policy will be adopted for some considerable time; but the tactics pursued by the Bishops and their supporters will assuredly drive public opinion in that direction.

It is not an inviting task to thread the mazes of debate in the Upper House, and most readers will, no doubt, be satisfied to seize upon the chief alterations made in the Bill. These can be briefly summarised, though their implications are very wide and deep. The first clause has been amended so as to compel local authorities throughout the country to give religious instruction on every school-day and within school hours. The second gave authorities the option of taking over existing voluntary schools; this option has been taken away, and the authorities now "shall, if required by the owners," continue such a school—provision being made for negotiations as to terms and for appeal to the Board of Education as to suitability of buildings. As to clause 3 it is instructive to notice that the Duke of Devonshire and other Unionist peers defeated a proposal to grant "facilities" to give denominational instruction in all schools whether "provided" or "non-provided"; but, in spite of this rebuff, the Bishops and clerical party have pressed hard in the direction indicated.

THUS the "facilities" are to be granted in "provided" schools in rural parishes with only one school; and, as regards "non-provided" schools "extended facilities" are to be granted for denominational instruction on all five mornings in the week. Clause 4 in the original form permitted such instruction if eighty per cent. of the parents expressed a desire for it. This requirement has been altered to a bare majority (though a considerable number of Unionist peers opposed this change), and, instead of being permissive, the clause is made mandatory by substituting "shall" for "may." In general it may be said the policy of the Lords has been to weaken local authorities and to bind them in denominational bonds from the outset.

ON Wednesday Clause 4 was passed in its altered form, one of the more serious alterations being one that compels the education authorities to permit teachers on the regular staff of a school to give denominational instruction where it is to be provided. It does not require very keen vision to detect here a grave peril to the liberty of teachers, innocent as the alteration looks. This clause has, however, been a troublesome one from the first, and we cannot wonder that it emerges from the Lords in a questionable shape. Critics say that, as it now stands, any single Dissenting parent may, in many districts, block the very "facilities" the Bishops are so eager to secure.

AT the opening of the French autumnal session for the despatch of public business, M. Clemenceau, the new Prime Minister, expounded at length the policy of his Government. He is in favour of the maintenance of peace, and of the alliances and tried friendships with Russia and this country. The general declaration of peace principles will be received with a sense of lively satisfaction, though hardly with surprise. M. Clemenceau does not, however, offer any prospect of furthering the disarmament movement at the next Hague Congress, and his policy will not pacify the anti-militarist party in France. One bold and ingenious step he does announce. Martial law is to be abolished, and military offences are to be tried by the ordinary courts, and thus, it is hoped, life in the Army may be rendered compatible with the rights of man. It is fitting that General Picquart, who knows as well as any man living the ways of military courts, should now have a hand in abolishing them:

M. CLEMENCEAU's announcements on home politics are interesting as showing how far the minister, whose mission it is to combat socialism, is prepared to go in social legislation. The Times correspondent hails the policy as a bulwark against socialism. The Times leader writer seems to dread it as socialism under another name, and the telegraphic summary of the speech is perhaps hardly full enough to justify us in saying that it is neither the one nor the other. But it is what in this country would be regarded as pretty advanced Radicalism: The outstanding feature of the programme is the Old Age Pensions Bill, which has passed the Chamber of Deputies and now goes to the Senate. If, as is probable, it is enacted in something like its present form, it will be in some respects more generous in its terms than the German law. Then there is to be a Ten Hours Bill, Trade Union legislation, and, what may be of more interest to readers of THE INQUIRER, a proposal for making French railway trains keep better time. This is to be done by a further extensive nationalising of the western lines. We notice also proposals for graduated income tax; and both the French Chamber and the French Government mean not only talk, but prompt action in these directions:

MRS. PRISCILLA McLAREN, who was John Bright's sister, died at Edinburgh on Monday, in her ninety-second year. Born at Rochdale in 1815, it was in 1848 that she married the late Duncan McLaren, whom she survived for twenty-one years. In early life she had been taken by Elizabeth Fry on her visits among the female prisoners at Newgate, and was in close touch with the Anti-Slavery and Anti-Corn Law movements. One of the earliest champions of Women's Suffrage, she was at the time of her death President of the Edinburgh Society. With Dr. Agnes McLaren she took a prominent part in the agitation for the admission of women as medical students in Edinburgh University. One of her two surviving sons, Sir Charles McLaren, and his son, Mr. Henry Duncan McLaren, are both in Parliament.

THE spirit in which Dr. Stubbs will enter upon his new charge as Bishop of Truro finds expression in the following passage of a letter he has addressed to his old friend and fellow-townsmen, the Rev. H. Epworth Thompson, Wesleyan Chairman of the Devonport and Plymouth District, who had written to congratulate him on his appointment:—"If I know anything of my own heart, I honestly believe that I have no more earnest desire than to live in brotherly communion and fellowship with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, be they who they may, and to foster, as far as I may be able, a spirit of Christian unity, amid whatever diversity of outward form, among all classes in Cornwall. Let us work together—let us pray together for this."

time or another troubles most Nonconformist ministers, and that the laity are not altogether indifferent about it is proved by the criticisms they occasionally make on the portion of Scripture read in their hearing. It used to be the practice of the Wesleyan ministers, or many of them, to read the lessons appointed for the day in the Church of England Prayer-book. But when these proved to be unsuitable, a minister looked for his lessons elsewhere. A new Lectionary for the use of Wesleyan preachers has just been compiled, based on the "three years' system." During a three years' ministry a preacher will read to his congregation nearly all the New Testament—in the first year reading Mark's Gospel with the Epistles of St. Peter and St. James; in the second year Luke and the letters of St. Paul; in the third year Matthew and the Johannine writings. A three years' course from the Old Testament accompanies these readings from the New. As the Methodist Times expresses a hope that ministers and local preachers will give the new system a trial, we may judge that there is no intention on the part of Conference to issue any general order upon the subject, and the use or partial use of the Lectionary will be within a minister's own discretion:

It having been decided to establish a Yorkshire Unitarian Club, "to promote social intercourse among men connected with the Unitarian Churches of Yorkshire, and to further the interests of liberal religious thought," a meeting is to be held in the Priestley Hall, at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Saturday, Nov. 24, to consider the details of the scheme. The chair will be taken at 3.30 by Mr. Henry Lupton, President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. It is proposed to hold three or four meetings during the year, and to begin each meeting with dinner or tea at not more than 1s. 6d. per head. After the ordinary business, subjects of general interest to the churches and the club are to be introduced for discussion. We are informed that as at present decided, the membership will be drawn from Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Pudsey, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, Lydgate, Idle, Wakefield, Pepperhill, and Elland. It is desired that all classes of the Unitarian community within the area of the club shall join. Sunday-school teachers, elder scholars, and members of the congregations are asked to attend the meeting. It is hoped that the club will be established on a basis that shall satisfy (within reasonable limits), the requirements of all. Information will be given, and personal invitations to attend the meeting issued, to inquirers up to the 17th inst., by Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield Mount, Beeston, Leeds.

THE Warden of Mansfield House, Caning Town, is making an appeal not for money but for men, for men who will be ready to live there, to spend their days there, or, if professionally occupied or engaged in business during the day, yet to spend evenings and week-ends. The intercourse with the inmates of the Settlement should be congenial, and the opportunities for social service are numerous and extensive: "There is," as Mr. Cubbon says, "ample scope here for the largest ingenuity, enterprise, and experience in citizenship and social service. But if any man is unwilling to join our brotherhood from a feeling of unfitness due either to inexperience or any other cause, we hope that he will not allow that hindrance to remain operative, for some of the most effective and helpful workers in the Settlement have been those who entered on the work with diffidence." That strikes us as having an application much broader than its first reference to Settlement work. We cannot wish Mansfield House or any good work for humanity a better wish than that they may get the workers they want, and, above all, that they may get the strong, diffident men:

THE destruction of Selby Abbey Church by fire on October 20 was a national loss, for it was not only a very noble building, but the only one of its kind which had survived in Yorkshire the earlier destruction of the Abbeys. This calamity is the subject of the Rev. C. Hargrove's sermon in the November Mill Hill Pulpit.—

"A few days ago I walked with a sad little crowd as of mourners by a grave in the narrow south aisle which is all that is left of the Abbey Church of Selby still roofed over and free of ruin and safe from danger of falling stone or beam. From the Western Doorway to the East Wall the floor was heaped with blackened timbers, the ruin of the fallen roof and burnt furniture of the Church. Bare to the sky rose on either hand arches above arches supporting the clerestory and the walls on which the beams had rested to uphold the double roof. Column and wall were everywhere smoked by the flames, and where the fire had burned the hottest the stone was chipped and showed as raw flesh from which the skin had been torn by torture. Beneath the tower lay five great bells fallen and broken, while other three, caught in the iron rafters rest insecurely above. Benches and pulpit and stalls and choir screen and altar were all gone, only here and there a rare fragment left as memoranda to recall to mind what they were so few days ago. Almost alone uninjured the Western window showed against the sunset the dying Christ who looked from his Cross over the unbroken length of devastated nave and choir to the window, little injured, which, after ancient fashion, records his descent from David. The organ consumed in the fierceness of the heat had sunk as it were into the ground, and now at the wonted hour of evensong there was no congregation save of onlookers come from far and near to view the scene of ruin, and no sound broke the stillness of desolation save the low tones of men and women chastened by the view of so great a calamity. Without one saw the roofless walls and broken windows, the exterior skeleton of a dead church, and on the tower the four clock faces recorded as if epitaphs of a sepulchral monument the hour and minute at which they had shared the doom of the ancient Abbey."

Though the Abbey Church may be rebuilt with all the means that wealth can command the past glory can never be restored. What is the significance of the history of such a venerable church, should be read in Mr. Hargrove's sermon

NORTH MIDLAND ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS:

A FINE spirit of fellowship and goodwill marked the annual meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, which were held this year at Derby, on Monday and Tuesday last, November 5 and 6. The Friar Gate congregation rose handsomely to the occasion, and held a delightful conversation of welcome to the officers, ministers, and delegates on Monday evening. The Friar Gate school premises were literally "as fresh as paint," having been recently cleaned, decorated, and added to on a considerable scale. Mr. S. D. Hall, a warden of the church, offered the welcome to the Association, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas replied: During the evening an excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music was rendered and refreshments were served.

On the followday day (Tuesday) sterner work had to be faced, and after a meeting of the general committee, followed by a meeting of the governing body, the annual business meeting was held at 11.30 a.m. under the chairmanship of the president of the Association, Alderman W. Moss, J.P., of Loughborough. The secretary called the roll.

The Committee's annual report gave an account of the new movement at Coalville in the furtherance of which an earnest and determined spirit had been shown, and went on to refer to the refusal of the Lincoln Trustees to open the chapel for public worship until the income from endowments accumulated such a sum as would pay off a debt contracted for repairs and alterations. This means that the chapel will probably remain closed for some four or five years—a state of things the Committee profoundly deplored but were unable to prevent. This was all the more regrettable having regard to the work done by the Association for Lincoln, in securing an appointment of new trustees. As there was now no worshipping congregation at the Chapel, the name was omitted from the District list of Churches for the time being. The report also mentioned that the Committee, impressed by the gravity of our social problems, had issued a circular on the subject to the Churches, and that the response had been most gratifying. The Lay Preachers' Union, which was again offered the cordial thanks of the Association, now comprised no less than seventeen members, and was in a flourishing condition. The Hon. Treasurer, Mr. B. Dowson, in presenting the statement of accounts, said that the financial support given to the Association, could not be considered satisfactory. It betokened a want of interest on the part of the congregations in the work of the Association: The subscription lists and collections were gradually falling off. Some action ought to be immediately taken to revive the decaying interest and bring the work of the Association more prominently before the constituent churches.

On the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev Lang Buckland, the reports were adopted. The Association welcomed into its fellowship the following ministers:—The Revs. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A.; A. Hermann Thomas, M.A., F. Heming Vaughan, B.A.; and Ellison A. Voysey, M.A. The president, vice-president, treasurer, secretary, and auditor were re-elected and the new committee was appointed. After a lunch at the Royal Hotel the Association re-assembled at 2.30 p.m. in conference. At the opening of the meeting, a hearty welcome was given to the representative of the National Conference (Mr. J. Harrop White), and a letter was read from the Secretary of The British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The Rev. A. Hermann Thomas then read an extremely able paper on "POLITICS AND THE PULPIT."

The subject, he said, divided itself into two questions: Is it lawful? Is it expedient? As regards the lawfulness of treating politics from the pulpit, no one would deny that in our churches, with their tradition of freedom, each minister was at liberty to choose his own subjects. He might find that his conclusions clashed with the ideas of his congregation, and that his so-called freedom shrank to very small dimensions, but in theory he held his position in order to give of his best, and what might be his best was for him alone to decide. On wider grounds, the question resolved itself into one of fidelity to conscience. The minister was a prophet, finding and speaking his own revelation, which it would be disloyalty to withhold. The prophets of old uttered an intensely political message. On great matters which affected the well-being and morality of people, the pulpit was expected to take a lead without fear or favour. In the next place, politics could not be regarded as divorced from religion, for there was no clear dividing line between religion, commerce, politics, and many other movements of thought and action. Religion was the spirit which should direct them all. As regards the second question, is it expedient? the word expedient must be taken in the sense in which St. Paul meant it, "All things are lawful, but all things edify not." Any course was inexpedient which did not produce the spiritual good for which it was adopted. In practice the preaching of politics was attended with grave dangers. Though conscience was divine in its nature, it was largely human in its expression, and might be frankly criticised when it consistently carried the same party colours. It was a mistake to utter one's temporary judgments on practical questions of the day with the same emphasis as the great principles of conduct and religion which had been proved by generations of devout lives. The only escape was to take politics in its widest sense and vigorously exclude all party feeling. Party politics in the pulpit did not convince the majority of the congregation who already agreed with them, nor did they convince the two or three dissentients who had come to church primarily to worship. The more a minister considered the question, looking to the precious opportunity given to him by the time for his discourse, the more he would be inclined to endorse the words of the Apostle: "All things are lawful, but not all things are expedient."

The paper was followed by an unusually good discussion, which was opened by Mr. F. Robinson, of Nottingham. He was followed by Mr. Jackson, who spoke as one detached from the Christian Churches and as a representative of the Labour movement. The Rev. Ellison A. Voysey and Mr. B. Dowson strongly supported the reader of the paper, and emphasised the inexpediency of introducing politics into the pulpit. The Rev. Lloyd Thomas submitted a different view, urging that much depended on one's definition of politics, and that every worthy subject of great human urgency, if approached in a right spirit, was a fitting theme for the pulpit. Mr. Goacher (of Coalville) supported this view, which was powerfully reinforced by Mr. J. Harrop White in a stirring speech. Miss M. C. Gittins dwelt on the teaching function of the pulpit, and said that if congregations were educated in an atmosphere of steady social purpose there would arise no difficulty on the emergence of some great national or social crisis.

The Rev. A. Hermann Thomas replied, correcting some misapprehensions, and again distinguishing between what was lawful for the pulpit, and what, having regard to the highest interests of the congregation, was expedient. A very cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Hermann Thomas was unanimously passed.

In the evening, at 7 p.m., the public worship was conducted by the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, assisted by the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. James Drummond from the text 2 Cor. iii. 15, 16, his subject being "The Interpretation of the Scriptures."

The whole series of meetings maintained a high level of interest and helpfulness throughout, and compared favourably with any of the annual meetings held in recent years.

THE officers of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission have issued an appeal on behalf of the new movement at Blackburn, inaugurated last year by the Rev. C. Travers, of Preston, and some of the neighbouring ministers. There appears now to be really good hope of a prosperous issue, if sufficient support is given at the outset, and the Mission ask for a fund of £75 for two years for that purpose. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. David Healey, J.P., The Brooklands, Heywood. Friends interested in Blackburn, who have not seen the appeal, should send for it to the Rev. R. T. Herford at Stand.

THE appeal of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union for the last £100 of the cost of the new church at West Bowling, Bradford, advertised this week, is one for which we must hope for a speedy response. The congregation, as we recently reported, have entered upon their new home in an earnest and determined spirit, and there is prospect of good work of religious upbuilding being done.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A WORD OF FAREWELL.

SIR,—The rule in regard to children that they should be "seen and not heard" does not apply to Unitarian ministers. They must be seen and heard, both in season and out of season. In looking over the pages of THE INQUIRER it occurs to me that my name has recently occurred more than is in accordance with the fitness of things; and yet I must ask space for another word. I want to thank the many friends in various parts of the country for their kindness to their American friends.

In the six months in which we have been in Great Britain we have found so much goodwill that it is hard to say farewell. May 1, through THE INQUIRER, express the hope that next year we may have the opportunity of seeing a great many of our friends in Boston—the more the merrier!

THE "NEW THEOLOGY" AND UNITARIANS.

SIR,—Have you observed a curious and not entirely beautiful tendency on the part of certain "New Theology" men to differentiate Unitarianism from it, and to present Unitarianism as a sort of dry, materialistic Deism? This may be only want of knowledge, but I am sorry to think there is knowing intention in it.

Here, for instance, in the Daily News, is the report of a discourse by the Rev. E. W. Lewis, minister of the Clapham Congregational Church, who classes Unitarians as Deists who believe that God created the world (Genesis fashion) from without, and who deny the immanence of God in the Human Race. Of course, the opposite is the truth, though let it be cheerfully admitted that Unitarians (in common with Congregationalists) have, in these latter days, come into possession of a larger spiritual heritage.

A very bad case is that of the two ministers of the Anerley Congregational Church. In their monthly paper they printed a communication from Mr. R. J. Campbell on the person of Jesus, in which he said: "The Church has been right in insisting all along that Jesus was very God. . . . But what the creed-makers did not see was that what they asserted about Jesus was also true of all mankind." This naturally led me to say that Mr. Campbell's statement was a Unitarian statement, inasmuch as it classed Christ as God with all mankind—that is to say, as manifesting God. Attacking this, the ministers of the Anerley Church, in their magazine, say: "Mr. Campbell writes, 'The Church has been right in insisting that Jesus was very God.' And again, 'Jesus was really and truly God.' . . . Have you ever come across a single Unitarian who would admit anything of the kind?" These men also forget that what Mr. Campbell asserted of Jesus he asserted of all mankind. This tremendous addition to Mr. Campbell's statement is painfully suppressed by the Anerley men. As Mr. Campbell puts it, every Unitarian would probably agree—that in any sense in which Jesus was God we all are so. It is, in fact, a simple assertion of the Immanence of God in all things—a great uniting thought.

In the effort to differentiate their Unitarianism from ours, it is evident that there is going to be a good deal of anxious manipulation on the part of the "New Theology" men; but it is to be hoped that quotations will at least be kept honest.

COAL MINING PROFITS.

SIR,—Allow me just to say with regard to Mr. Simon's figures that value at the pit's mouth is not the only fact we want. What is being obtained for the coal when sold by the colliery proprietor? In the same district, where the pit-brow man's wages are 3s. 4d. per day, never more than five days work, sometimes in the summer two or three days weekly only, coal is sold at 16s. to 18s. for household use, carted straight from the collieries at 10s. 6d. in large quantities to gas works, at 10s. in large quantities to steamers, with low railway rates as the distances are short.

Under these circumstances, for employers to allow men who have worked for them all the week, and have no other work to go to, to leave at the end of the week with 16s. 8d. as a maximum, often less, on which to support wife and family, is to directly contribute to the serious evils of the social state, physical deterioration, slumdom, drink, pauperism, and a shortened existence. They cannot evade this responsibility, whether the result is indifference, or simply the supposed necessities of business.

It is healthy to see that the effect of public opinion now leads to minimising profits made out of labour; not so long ago the boasts were quite of another kind.

I might add that the mining royalties in the district referred to (South Lancashire) are, I am informed, 8d. and 9d. per ton.

PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE INCORPORATED SOCIETY.

SIR,—At about this time of the year you have generally allowed me a little space in your paper to ask our friends to help us to provide presents for our Christmas Tree. This year we are in greater need than ever—our family is so big. We have over a hundred boys and girls to find presents for. They vary in age from five years old to eighteen, so that we can do with a considerable variety of gifts. Toys for the little ones are most acceptable; they need not be very expensive—that goes without saying; but we should like to have them all in good condition; and we should be glad of any mechanical toys—they give great pleasure. So do picture-books, especially coloured ones. For the girls, dolls never come amiss, and even some of the boys like them. For the bigger children small articles of dress are very welcome—pocket-handkerchiefs, neckties, ribbons, gloves; or, for the girls little sewing cases. We should be very grateful, too, for pictures for our walls. They should be framed neatly and strongly.

We have not nearly enough for our new schools, and the children do think so much of pictures on their walls. I hope your readers will not think I am very greedy in my requests. I am sure they would not mind my making them if they could see our children. We have a great deal to do with our money, and it is not easy to make it buy all that we need. Clothes and boots and other things that are very necessary for the boys and girls, but very uninteresting to them, have a first claim on our attention. We have had a great deal of kind help, but, in the nature of things, we must always be "asking for more."

May I also mention that we have on hand a number of dolls' clothes horses, which our children have made in the course of their lessons on manual work. They are nice little models, and we will send one to anyone for sixpence. They would please any little girl. We hope that by-and-bye we may be able to supply other models. I shall have the pleasure, shortly of sending you our new annual report. I hope you will find it interesting reading. I must not take up any more of your valuable space. It will give me great pleasure if any of your readers will respond to my request and send me parcels or single toys at any time between now and the end of the first week in December:

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

I was awakened by a splash of blood-red light on my white wall, though my window looked west. It was the first beam that over-topped Muottas Muraigl, flung back by an autumnal larch-wood, that clings to an almost sheer face of rock below Piz Padella. But that was three weeks ago, and since then the snow has come and gone, and deadened the glow of our larches. Sombre they stand, dusky-brown, against the sombre green of their companion pines. In contrast with the pure blue and white of the sky, and the indescribable tints of near and distant mountains, they are still beautiful, and the sun draws out of them the subtlest colour-music. For the sun of summer is still with us; but his daily course is shorter and shorter, and the evenings grow chill, and I have had to bring out my old rug.

It is a friend true and tried. Well do I remember when I bought it in the Cornmarket the week before Henley, in my last year at Oxford. I had got through the paper-work for Lit. Hum., and was polishing up rusty places for the viva-voce, when the tempter appeared. Never was Abaddon more welcome! I had coached him through his Greats a year ago, and he now wore a bachelor's gown in some school or other—at Henley, as it happened—so that he was a sight for sore eyes. Moreover, he was the most perfect comrade you can imagine for cell or fell—a naturalist, a bookman, a lover of old plays and rustic legends—Isaak Walton and Charles Lamb in one. We had walked hundreds of miles, and turned over thousands of dusty tomes together, tracked the Scholar Gipsy through all his haunts, and ransacked every old bookshop within twenty miles of Isis.

"Come out of this," quoth he; "what is the sense of fagging yourself silly? You are sure of your First, anyhow"—oh! sanguine tempter!—"and a bit of holiday will put you in trim for your viva." I yielded, and on the fatal day could give my smiling questioner no really satisfactory information about the policy of the Delphic oracle, though what I did impart seemed to please him, for he continued to smile. And when the List came out—but that is another story.

I wanted to see the Southern cathedrals, and the distance did not leave time for walking. My friend could not bicycle. So we chartered (horresco referens) a huge tandem tricycle—this was in the days of Jowett and solid tyres, my children. I was to steer, and Abaddon to navigate, with due regard to the well-known maxim, Of two hills choose the least. As we intended to bivouac I bought a new invention called a pyjama sleeping-suit and a shawl rug. With this equipment strapped on my handle-bar, I bestrode, in flannels and blazer, the fore-part of the machine; the tempter, in similar gear, but clad in darker flannels, got up behind me, and forth we pedalled in the cool of the evening. We passed Bessle's Lea, the estate of the Lenthalls. If the Abaddon of Charles's day had not stood for his king, the crop-headed Parliament would not have seized most of his land and given it to their Speaker, and everything from that hedge to the other side Frilford would have fallen to my comrade. At Frilford we supped, and then made forward through Wantage, after which we did not meet a soul—except a hedgehog, which we nearly ran over. We reached White Horse Hill, pushed our chariot up its wearying slopes, dived through the fosse, surmounted the vallum, and stabled in the fine old Roman Camp called Uffington Castle.

The rug was warm, the foot of the vallum a kindly pillow, but I had hardly closed my eyes before "the heavens rang with shouting of the larks." What a nuisance they were! I hated them as bitterly as I learned, a year or two later, to hate the bawling nightingales which kept me awake at the R.N.A. in Hampshire—the French Professor threw boots at them—"for sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds." I slept at last, and awoke at six. Abaddon was already astir. He led me all over the horse, and the little hill opposite (Dragon's Hill, is it?), and told me all the legends of both. Then we mounted, rode across the flat camp and out at the Prætorian Gate, down the grass-grown Rudge Way, across the road to Lambourn, and on to Wayland Smith's cave. Anybody who has read "Kenilworth," and "Puck of Pook's Hill," and a monograph on cromlechs, can imagine some of the things I listened to here; when the discourse ended, we were both parching with thirst. We ought to have regained the Lambourn road, but a nearer track set off in a similar direction, and we trusted ourselves to its seduction. It was pleasant to sail away down-hill, and delightful to spy the smoke of a cottage chimney, which promised water or milk. We dismounted, knocked, waited, knocked again—in vain. At last we entered. On the floor lay a child, listlessly sick. By the fire sat a woman, stupefied with grief, with another child, white and rigid, stretched on her lap. We roused her, not without difficulty, and heard her story. Her husband, a farm-labourer, earned nine shillings a week, and they had six children. Last night, on coming from work, he had walked seven miles to fetch the parish doctor, but had been referred to another doctor, who lived seven miles off in the other direction. He had returned, set out again, found his man, come back, had breakfast, and gone off to another day's work. That was hours ago, and no doctor had appeared; and the child—she bent over it again, and our questions fell on deaf ears. She may have heard us promise to send a doctor from Lambourn; she gave no sign. We drank some milk, left money, and set off with all speed. Suddenly the road ended in a pasture, and before us was a thick wood. We bore to the left, dragged our unwieldy machine up a grassy hill, over a ditch, through a hedge, across a ploughed field, and in the end reached a cart-road; but it was covered with loose stones, and so deeply rutted that riding was impossible. We made our way through the fields by the side of it, riding zig-zag from gate to gate, until at last the rough road became a little less rough, and we could use it. We reached Up Lambourn, but there was no doctor there, so on we sped to Church Lambourn, and in the very last house of that long village lived Dr. K. He was at home, and very kindly agreed to set off at once to the help of our cottagers. But the child, as we afterwards learned, had already passed away.

Mrs. K. insisted on offering hospitality, and while we were being royally entertained Abaddon and she discovered many friends in common. It was afternoon before we departed for Hungerford, en route for Salisbury. We must arrive in time to visit a shop or two, to make ourselves decent for the morrow, which would be Sunday. Of all evil roads that ever I rode or trod, the vilest are those that traverse Salisbury Plain! We made slow headway, and when we reached Old Sarum—where we must needs linger a little—it was already dusk. We lost our way, and found ourselves ploughing along, out of all bearings, in dense darkness. Suddenly we were splashing over crank and ankle in water, and our lamps gave us to know that we were fording the Avon. Here was a clue. A path by the river was, luckily, wide enough for our tricycle; at one o'clock on Sunday morning we rang at the door of the White Hart.

The only tailor whom we could induce—some seven hours later—to open his shop provided me with a pair of lavender canvas trousers with a flowery pattern, and a slate-coloured holland coat, the sole ready-made garments in his stock which were within inches of fitting me. They were at least clean, and my flannels were impossible; so, in this gay attire, surmounted by a tennis-hat, and accompanied by a friend whose garb was only a shade more conventional, I went to service in Salisbury Cathedral. The next time I attended service there I was a guest in the Theological College, and Abaddon came round in a cassock to collect alms.

We camped that night in Stonehenge—as yet inviolate. I shall never forget the old, worn, lonely majesty of that mysterious heap against the sky-line, amid the bare plain. Constables, barbed wire, and booking-offices are as much in keeping with it as roundabouts and cocoanut-shies. They may be needed to preserve the stones (which have lasted fairly well without such guardianship), but they destroy Stonehenge. You know, of course, the big sloping stone in the inner ring? I made a chair-back of it, and, wrapped in my rug, slept the sleep of the just. But not long. What grim form it was that stole out from among the ghostly stones I do not remember—dreams are soon forgotten—perhaps an old Pictish priest with dripping knife. It seized my hair, pulled my head forwards, and dropped it back against my stone pillow again and again. I awoke, and once more my head was lifted and dropped. A row of hard, black beetles, with rounded backs, was making some ritual procession across the stone. As each insect reached the place where my head rested, it scorned to turn aside, but simply humped itself underneath and crawled on, letting the burden slip down over its tail. There were other beetles about besides these. I sprang up, and was out of my night-gear in a twinkling, Abaddon likewise. We shook the things well, but could not be sure that nothing still lurked in the flapping folds. Next moment the astonished stars looked down on two gymnosophists riding a tandem tricycle on Salisbury Plain at midnight. "Such sight in England ne'er had been, and ne'er again shall be." We reached the road and pursued it to the friendly shelter of a beech grove. Beeches are the cosiest of trees. There we resumed our night array, and slept in the greatest comfort till cock-crow.

Our next halting-place was Bournemouth. At Christchurch something serious went wrong with the machine. After seeing the Abbey and paying for repairs and for a meal, we compared financial notes and found that we possessed one halfpenny in cash and a penny stamp. Ignominiously turned back at a toll-bridge, we still succeeded in reaching Bournemouth, and remained there in pawn at a Temperance Hotel—unable to shave, to buy a paper, to go on the pier, and shunning all public places for fear of acquaintances. In sequestered chimes we discussed the great typographical problem, "Who was Bercula?" and quarrelled to pass the time. We had lost our chance of seeing Exeter, for one of us wanted to meet someone—"a friend," he said—at Henley; so back we went through the New Forest, over roads patched in places with tree-trunks and brushwood, to Southampton, Winchester, Basingstoke, and Reading. The G.W.R. contrived to lose our machine between Reading and Oxford—I have known them to lose a ten-ton rolling mill for six weeks—and we had only one glimpse of the "friend," who was just getting into somebody else's Canadian canoe.

My rug has been with me since then on many windy islands—Bute, Lindisfarne, Coquet, Man, Tresco; it covered me on the eve of ordination; and I have shaken confetti out of it in a reserved compartment. Without me it has been over the Atlantic and the Rocky Mountains, has cruised on the Pacific, seen the Great Lakes and the big cities of the States. When I came to Davos I left it behind, and when the others joined me they left it in the train. I had given up hope of regaining it, when, one morning, as I entered my study, there it lay on the table! No label, packing, explanation, or fee! Such incidents are rare in all places, and in Switzerland quite amazing. The sight of it set the leaves of memory fluttering like my Hibbert on this breezy balcony.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XXII.—HOLY PLACES.

THAT which most angered Christ, in the Cleansing of the Temple, was the endeavour to blend the spirit of prayer, which is devotion, with the spirit of merchandise, which is self-seeking. There was but a low partition-wall between the worship of the Temple and its trade. The confusion had grown out of small encroachments and small concessions. Christian parallels would not be hard to find—cases in which the Church, by abuse of privilege, has made use of the world, and the world, in its struggle for wealth, has made use of the Church. Mammon has always been able to set up his market side by side with the house of prayer, and after a time it is difficult to find the dividing line, until the reforming hand is raised, and the voice is heard of one who has the courage to say, "Take these things hence."

As with days, so with places; some would say that to think of one place as holier than another is superstition. The bricks-and-mortar argument is one with which we are all familiar. Inasmuch as holiness is a spiritual quality, the objection may be allowed; but to think of a place as hallowed is not quite the same thing, and need not be superstitious. It may be doubted whether we should be able to realise Divine Presence at all, if God were thought of as equally present everywhere. It has been said that the Holy of Holies was only like any other empty room. Shall we say, therefore, that every empty room helped the Jew to feel his way to the spiritual worship of the unseen God? Say what we may, life is full of consecrations. All things are common, until love has glorified, or death has sanctified them. As long as we have human affections, we shall go on importing into times and places, and dead senseless matter, those things which by nature they cannot have. We may even say that worship in spirit and in truth is, in our present state, almost impossible. It would mean the shutting out of everything material and external—all accessories, music and form and colour and sign and symbolism of every kind—the things which are not in themselves spiritual. The spirit of Christ, on the other hand, is a spirit of reverence strongly imaginative, strongly conscious of the interpenetration of matter by spirit, strongly affected by association, reading parables in nature, but recognising also the helpfulness of art. Was it superstition in him to assume that the Temple could not at the same time be the house of prayer and the house of merchandise?

PROFESSOR ALBERT RÉVILLE.*

THE lamented death of Professor Albert Réville removes from the field of liberal religion and scholarship in France a venerable and distinguished personality, faithful through a long life of devoted labour to the sacred principle of "freedom by the truth." Born near Dieppe, November 4, 1826, he had very nearly completed his eightieth year. He came of a family that had long served the cause of Liberal Protestantism. His father held the pastorate in the village of Luneray in the department of the Lower Seine for many years; there, too, his brother Henri discharged the same duty; and there he himself also, after a brief ministry at Nîmes on completing his theological studies at Geneva, for a short time occupied the pulpit. The breadth of his early culture may be inferred from the translations from English and German which proceeded from his active pen in 1849 and 1851, when he became pastor of the Reformed Walloon Church in Rotterdam. In the Dutch city at the mouth of the Rhine there was a certain cosmopolitan element which suited his broad and comprehensive genius. Here he could survey with a lofty detachment of view the movements of thought in different countries, and appropriate the best in each for the religious training of the young in his own church. Here he produced essay after essay in the wide field of religious history, which marked him out at once as the laborious student, the skilful expositor, and the generous and sympathetic interpreter of different forms of spiritual life. He did not, perhaps, possess the exquisite grace or the mocking irony of his elder contemporary Renan; but he was entirely free from his affectations. Every line that he wrote was instinct with sincerity; he never played with faith; he was too loyal to great issues to prefer artistry to truth. His critical study of the Gospel according to Matthew gained him the Doctor's degree at Leiden in 1862, while his admirable volumes on Theodore Parker and the Doctrine of the Deity of Christ made him well known in this country. He could enter into the many-sided activity of the great American preacher; he sympathised profoundly with his passion for liberty; he truly designated him as the representative of the prophetic spirit; and he ranged himself unreservedly on the side of his Christian Theism. In this religion he found a union of simple—almost sober—doctrine with a great wealth of applications to individual and social life; and, with his feet firmly planted on the inmost facts of enduring religious experience, he could face without fear the passing fashions of materialist philosophy.

The time was at hand when he, too, would be tried. The bitter destiny of France in the hour of her humiliation before Germany moved his deepest soul. He could no longer remain absent from her soil; he, too, must take his share, however modest, in the great work of social and moral reconstruction by which her national life should be renewed. So in 1872 he prepared to return to France. "I am,"

* Many of the biographical details of this notice were kindly placed in my hands by Miss L. Toulmin Smith, Librarian of Manchester College.—J.E.C.

he said, in his farewell sermon to his beloved people at Rotterdam, "and I wish to continue to be, a Christian, a Protestant, a member and minister of the Reformed Church." To that purpose he remained faithful to the end. He seemed to himself like the citizen called to enrol himself in the day of his country's peril; he was but a unit, but it was of units, he said, that the regiment is made up, and each one must go where duty bade. He was, of course, no stranger in his native land. He had repeatedly attended the gatherings of French Protestant Liberals, and his constant contributions to journals and reviews had made his name widely known outside the limits of the Reformed Church. When M. Jules Ferry resolved in 1880 to found a chair for the History of Religions at the Collège de France, his choice for the first Professor fell without hesitation on M. Réville. The scholar-pastor accepted it from him as a great trust. "He told me," he said afterwards, "that I was to be absolutely free"; and this freedom carried with it high responsibilities. His habits of industry, his wide outlook, his skill in exposition, his lucidity of thought, now stood him in good stead. His name will not, indeed, be associated with fresh contributions to the theory of religion, its origin and evolution, like those of Max Müller, Tylor, or W. Robertson Smith, nor was he a scholar in many tongues, like Tiele or Sayce; but he had gifts of co-ordination and insight which enabled him to marshal complicated series of facts with singular clearness, and he was never afraid that by recognising the achievements of religious development elsewhere he could be disloyal to the Teacher whom he continuously served. Volume after volume of studies in the lower religions represented the earlier fruits of his labours. In 1889 he added to his other functions the presidency of the section of the "Sciences Religieuses" in the great "École des Hautes Études," to which English organisation can as yet show nothing comparable. His last—and, in some respects, his most important—work, "Jésus de Nazareth," published in 1897, had formed the basis of courses of lectures in his College chair. It embraced a careful survey of the historical antecedents of the Gospel and a critical study of the life of Jesus. Here, once more, there was no straining after effect, just as there was no parade of learning. The style was simple, calm, sincere. But the frankness with which Jesus was depicted in the midst of the hopes and beliefs of his age gave force to his final judgment. Well acquainted with both English and German researches, he could not, with Dr. Martineau, save Jesus from entanglement in unrealised expectations by declaring that he repudiated instead of accepting the Messianic title at Caesarea Philippi (ii. 168, of the new second edition). But that did not prevent him from also recognising as "one of the most remarkable traits of this incomparable physiognomy the marvellous conviction, the unalterable serenity, with which he predicted not his personal success, but the triumph of the religious intuitions in which his pure heart enabled him to discern eternal truths. His work properly so called, his indisputable work, is to have introduced into the human conscience an ideal of higher faith and morals, faith and morals bound together; an ideal of desire trusting in the divine purpose, of tenderness, of active pity, of religious sincerity, of unshakable fidelity to duty; an ideal where the terrifying nebula to which reason, with no other aid than itself, must give the name of God, is resolved for the heart which it attracts into rays of infinite love; an ideal which lends itself, with an elasticity too little noticed, to the successive evolutions and needs of human societies."

As a Hibbert Lecturer, M. Réville was welcomed in this country in 1884. He cherished the friendship of Dr. Martineau and Dr. Charles Beard. In France he was the distinguished leader not only of his own group of liberals in the Reformed Church, but also of the scholars who were devoting themselves to the rising study of the history of religions. He was interested in the establishment of the Musée Guimet, founded with such far-reaching labour by M. Emile Guimet in 1879 at Lyons; and he helped to make the arrangements with the Government by which it was transferred to Paris and became a national institution in 1888. When the Congress of the History of Religions held its first meeting in Paris during the great Exhibition of 1900, he was at once called to the President's chair, and every visitor immediately felt the grace of his welcome, the wisdom of his guidance, and the sympathetic courtesy with which he ensured the general harmony. Seated with his friend, Professor Holtzmann, at Basel, in 1904, in the conduct of the New Testament section, at the second meeting of the Congress, he presented, by the side of the massive scholarship and genial vigour of the German type, the dignity and refinement of the French. The lofty forehead, the clearly chiselled features, the delicate precision of speech, the restrained force behind the tranquil calm, showed the thinker who was also a man of affairs, the student who was no stranger to the practical demands of life. It was with a last message of devotion to the great cause of liberal religion that he sent his son, Professor Jean Réville, two weeks ago, from his dying bed to bear his greetings of hope and cheer to his assembled brethren in the ministry at Jarnac. He is called away to higher service at a grave crisis in the history of French Protestantism. May his spirit still live and work through those on whom devolves the heavy task of maintaining the energies of the Free Churches under the difficulties which the impending changes must involve. J.E.C.

M. Albert Réville was a man who not only became a venerated savant in historical and comparative religion, but who possessed in a strong degree the sense of citizenship and duty to his country. Happy as had been the life in Rotterdam, whither he took his Swiss bride from Geneva, where his children were born, and where lasting ties of friendship were formed, the war of 1870-71 with Germany awoke in him other feelings which called imperatively for satisfaction. He was a staunch republican, and held that it was the duty of a Frenchman to be in his native land to give what help he might in the hour of difficulty and trial. In 1872, therefore, returning to Dieppe, he built a house about two miles from the town, at Neuville, where he settled among his own people, taking an active interest in politics, canvassing for republican candidates in the contests with reactionaries. He himself was elected to some small local offices, and took part among his neighbours in furthering the welfare of the town. Neuville became the centre of charming family re-unions in later years; it opened its expansive walls to the members of a large family connection, and hither the host and his wife gathered together not only those nearest and dearest to them, but many a passing friend. The house stands on the side of a steep ridge, sheltered from the north, along a more gentle slope of which the master had laid out a skilfully planned garden; from the windows the valley, the ancient river bed of geologic times, in the embouchure of which, broadening out, lies old Dieppe, all come into view. Here among his walks and shaded alleys, or in the fruitful orchard, M. Réville, an early riser, worked several hours every day at his garden for pleasure and health.

His pen was hardly ever idle. Keeping in touch with his beloved Dieppe, for some years he contributed regularly to the local paper, until forced to give it up but a few months ago by increasing ill-health. Always ready in the cause of truth and justice, he took a moderate part in the Dreyfus controversy from the beginning. I well remember during a visit to Paris the excitement of his coming in to his son-in-law, Professor Paul Meyer, with the Aurore in his hand, in which Zola had just launched upon the astonished public his fateful challenge of the French authorities, "J'accuse" (January 13, 1898). M. Réville printed a set of papers on the Dreyfus affair in the Siecle, afterwards issued as a pamphlet, entitled, "Les Etapes d'un Intellectuel" (1898), a delightful piece of quiet reasoning which showed, as Mr. F. C. Conybeare believed, "how, little by little, the truth forced itself into his mind," but intended, as I think, for an object lesson.

M. Réville possessed that art of conversation which is endowed with sympathy for the point of view of others. This made his companionship a privilege, whether as cicerone to the Musée Guimet or elsewhere, or as explaining to a surprised visitor on first meeting the inward likeness between the Liberal French Christians and English Unitarians. Mme. Réville's quiet salon in Paris, during the years of health, has been the natural resort of many eminent liberal thinkers and literary men of all nations, where English were always welcome.

The spirit of steady work possessed the Professor, in spite of weakness, till the last. He lectured at the Collège de France from November, 1905, to May, 1906, on "King Henry VIII. and his Wives" (Reformation in England), discourses which were only composed since the previous July. They are now appearing month by month in the Revue Bleue, but the faltering pen has dropped its task for ever. It is a melancholy satisfaction to offer this little tribute in memory of a good and upright man of great kindness and brave heart, whose name should not be forgotten in England. L. TOULMIN SMITH.

MRS. JOHN GRUNDY.

THE Bank-street congregation at Bury has lost a life-long member through the death of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat House, who passed away at midnight on Saturday last, at the advanced age of 90. Three generations of her family had been connected with Bank-street Chapel. Her grandfather, Richard Hamer, worked as a boy for Messrs. Peel & Yates, and rose to be manager of the works, ultimately renting the Summerseat Cotton Mills from Sir Robert Peel, and (nearly a hundred years ago) acquiring the estate. Her husband, the late John Grundy, was solicitor to the East Lancashire Railway Company, and played an important part in the political life of Bury. He died twenty-six years ago, and his widow has since lived a retired life at Summerseat. She took a deep interest in the welfare of the congregation, and her loss will be deeply felt. It was she who gave the present manse for the use of the minister.

MR. THOMAS SLY.

THE congregation of the Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, has sustained a severe loss, by the sudden death, on Nov. 5, of its secretary, Mr. Thomas Sly, at the age of 57. For nearly ten years he had held the secretaryship with the devotion and ability which marked all the other activities in connection with the congregation in which he took part. He assisted in the Sunday-school and Band of Hope, and whether the circumstances were bright or depressing, worked steadily and unflinchingly. He was an enthusiastic and convinced Unitarian, and helped to make Unitarianism respected in his town by his teaching and his life. He was associated with the Abbey Chapel all his life; his aged father, who also has been a lifelong member, is still connected. Mr. Sly carried on business as a sawyer, and in recent years took over a restaurant business which had hitherto belonged to his father. He was an exceedingly modest and retiring man, and was always ready to prefer others to himself. Yet he was honoured and trusted by his fellow-townsmen. He was for many years chairman of the School Board, and was the vice-chairman of the local Educational Committee. He was an ardent politician, and was secretary of the Liberal Association. He was also colour-sergeant of the Volunteer Corps of his district. He leaves a widow, three daughters, and two sons. Conscious almost to the last moment, his last words were to his children gathered round him: "Be good men and women."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I HOPED to tell you this week something about the new little book by your old friend, Miss F. E. Cooke, "The Children's Hour," in which more than twenty of her Children's Columns are collected together. The book is published by the Sunday School Association, and costs a shilling (and 2d. more for postage), and I am sure you will like to have it. But this is all I can say about it now.

THE CONGO INFAMY.

WHOEVER has the honour of his country and of the Christian name at heart should procure and seriously study the terrible indictment of the KING of the BELGIANS and his infamous exploitation of what in strange irony is called the Congo Free State, just published by Mr. E. D. MOREL.* Since the report of King LEOPOLD's Commission last year, and the debate upon it in February in the Belgian House of Representatives,† the appalling truth has been forced upon many unwilling minds. For years Mr. MOREL and others have been steadfastly at work, seeking to compel public attention, but the facts were so horrible, and sordid interests involved on the other side so powerful and so persistent in misrepresentation, that the process of conviction has been very slow. When in 1902 Mr. MOREL published an earlier work on "Affairs of West Africa" the Times wrote: "If Mr. Morel is accurately informed there is hardly a condition of its (the Congo State's) charter that it has not broken, nor a law of common humanity which it has not flouted. The sufferings of which the picture was given to the world in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' are as nothing to those which Mr. MOREL represents to be the habitual accompaniment of the acquisition of rubber and ivory by the Belgian companies." And in the Daily Chronicle (December 20, 1902) Sir HARRY JOHNSTON wrote: "Mr. MOREL's indictment is one of the most terrible things ever written, if true." Now, after the official inquiry and the accumulated evidence of four more years, Sir HARRY JOHNSTON writes an introductory chapter to Mr. MOREL's new book, which sets forth in detail the whole case, and reproduces much of the utterly damning evidence. From intimate knowledge of West African affairs and particularly of the Congo, of which he was one of the early explorers, Sir HARRY JOHNSTON speaks with authority, and he now unhesitatingly admits that Mr. MOREL is right. This is how he records the effect upon his mind of the Commission's Report:—"Whether the report was published exactly as sent in by the Commissioners is open to question. But taking it in the form in which it received the imprimatur of King LEOPOLD himself, it was a sufficient justification of the accusations levelled at the Congo Free State by Mr. MOREL, by various British missionaries and travellers, and by Swedes, Frenchmen, and Italians. But in one's desire to judge as charitably as possible a man who might have been misled, one saw that a logical corollary to the publication of this report would be an attempt made by King LEOPOLD to sweep away a system which has been one of the most shocking—one of the few shocking—results of white intervention in Negro Africa. A year has passed since the publication of this report, and creditable testimony tends rather to show that the evils complained of in Congo territories have been intensified, while the direct utterances of the KING of the BELGIANS on the subject of his work on the Congo are deplorable in their sardonic indifference to the real condition of the natives of the great African dominion which Europe entrusted to his charge."

Twenty-one years ago, after the West African Conference at Berlin, King LEOPOLD, as head of the International Association of the Congo, was entrusted with the administration of that territory, equal in extent to the greater part of Europe, and undertook the task with professions of the most humane and benevolent intent. The natives were to be civilised by opening up their country to enlightened commerce. They were to be protected from oppression and injustice, and freedom of trade was to be maintained. So the KING was hailed as the generous inaugurator of a great civilising and humanitarian work. The actual result, as stated by the Marquis of LANSDOWNE in the House of Lords last July, has been "Bondage under the most barbarous and inhuman conditions, and maintained for mercenary motives of the most selfish character."

Mr. MOREL tells the whole detestable story of how the KING claimed, and has so far successfully maintained, his personal right, as practically autocratic Sovereign of that vast country, and owner of its wealth; of the shameless hypocrisy of his public professions, and the enormous profits secured, especially from the rubber trade, not by legitimate means, but by the cruellest extortion from a virtually enslaved people, accompanied by horrors of brutality, the sickening details of which must be gathered from Mr. MOREL's pages. It has been a stupendous crime against humanity, revolting in its cynicism, appalling, as it must now be, since the facts are undeniable, to the conscience of the enlightened nations of Europe. The system instituted by King LEOPOLD has been brutalising to all the instruments employed. "No one," says Mr. MOREL, "who has probed deep down into this cesspool of iniquity and naked human passions, or who understands the working of the monstrous growth which civilisation has allowed to spring up in Central Africa, blames the agents of the system, but the system itself. The miserable tools are to be pitied—brutes as many of them are, the déclassés, the failures, the off-scourings of Europe. It is the beneficiaries that should be pilloried, the modern slavers of Africa who sit at home and pocket the dividends." And he quotes a Belgian writer as saying: "The slave-trade has been re-established for the benefit of King LEOPOLD and twenty rich families in Belgium." It has been a practical enslavement of the whole people, and the KING's enormous profits have been derived "directly or indirectly from the unspeakable oppression, misery, and partial extermination of the native of Central Africa."

Let it be remembered that Great Britain, with other Powers, is directly responsible for having entrusted the KING of the BELGIANS with his benevolent mission. Every condition of the agreement of 1885 has been broken, and it is now clearly for the Powers who gave King LEOPOLD his commission, to make an end of the infamous system of oppression for private gain which has been suffered to usurp the place of government. Sir HARRY JOHNSTON makes it clear that the people of Belgium should be dissociated from the odium with which their KING is now regarded by educated people in Europe, Africa and America, but feels that they could not undertake the proper government of the Congo. What he urges is that an International Conference should once more be summoned to meet at Berlin, the Hague, or Paris, for the remodelling of the Congo State by its original creators. And Mr. MOREL points out steps which might immediately be taken by this country to vindicate our rights and the principles of humane government—steps which would probably lead the other Powers to consent at once to the desired International Conference.

Our purpose in this article is simply to induce our readers to listen to Mr. MOREL's plea, and to realise the dreadful facts, and the shame in which, so long as nothing decisive is done, we cannot escape our share of complicity.

NIAGARA.

A SERMON AFTER HOLIDAY.*

BY RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

"And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluja, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth,"—REV. xix. 6.

WHEN I have returned to you after making holiday in some new region of God's fair earth, it has been my habit to try to set before you, in the most pictorial words I could command, some scene which has impressed itself on my mind or heart by its beauty or sublimity and brought me messages of the might or love of God. In that broad new world from which I have just returned I have seen, as I have already told you, innumerable objects full of instruction and of inspiration. Of many of these I shall doubtless have much to say as time goes on. But I have looked upon one scene which stands out alone, and ever must stand out alone, in memory. I have seen Niagara; I have heard the voice of many waters, the voice of mighty thunders, saying "Alleluja: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

But the hard thing is that I am impotent to describe Niagara to you, and therefore impotent to convey to you with any vividness the reverberant message of its mighty cataracts. Niagara is, I suppose, the spectacle most sublime, most powerful to sway imagination, which it is given to human eyes on earth to see. But human tongue cannot describe it. Human artist cannot paint it. The most faithful photograph cannot reproduce it. No man can ever know it, ever understand it, ever interpret it, ever conceive it, ever flash its grandeur on him in imagination, unless its tumbling waters have been before his vision, the roar of its rejoicing has filled his ears, and he has breathed the cold and humid air whose currents its tumult has directed.

All that words can do with Niagara is to make of it, not a picture, but some sort of diagram; to give the statistics of its measurements and tonnage, and so leave these to make what poor impression they may on those who hear.

I was told by a multitude that I should be disappointed with my first sight of the famous Falls. God knows it was not so. At the first glance I knew that this was a new thing in life for me, an impression which thenceforth could never be forgotten, but would work in me all my days as one of the witnesses to the wonder and marvel of God.

You have heard the diagrammatic and statistical language which passes as descriptive of Niagara. I only repeat some little of this poor talk of lines and figures, because it is essential for the things which I want to say next to you, and which are to constitute my sermon.

A great jagged curve—on the whole and roughly semicircular—in total length a mile or so, but broken in the midst by the northern corner of a wooded islet which overhangs; this is the verge over which the waters fall. They fall, it is true, no great height, only some hundred and fifty or sixty feet. But when you go home, look at the map of North America. See what a space is occupied by Lakes Superior and Michigan and Huron and Erie: I suppose you could put the whole of the British Isles into those four lakes with huge spaces of water over. And all that volume of waters, those great inland seas, narrow themselves into the hurtling rapids above Niagara, and then over that verge they tumble to swell and leap and foam in the reaches of river below. Over the verge the water stands sheer up for twenty feet. Away down some three miles from the base the vast stream so hurries and swelters that it stands up thirty feet higher at the centre than at the shore. The water passing over the Horseshoe Fall alone has been estimated at fifteen hundred million cubic feet a minute, which would yield more than two billion tons in every hour of all the days in all the centuries.

Let me take you to the brow of the cliff on the Canadian side, within a few feet of the western edge of that larger section of the whole which is known as the Horseshoe Fall. What is the spectacle that meets one's eye? Away on the right the great waters of the upper river rushing to their fate. For a moment almost a calm as the waters reach a spot where the channel widens out a little to give them space. And then the solid thickness of twenty feet of water—twenty feet in thickness, fifteen hundred yards in length—hurled down the precipice to the narrower gorge below. And how looks the sheet as it makes that leap? Nearest to me in the sunshine a bright and sunny lilac, then a great breadth of green, greener than greenest grass. But below and beyond—where it foams the most—creamiest white, till the central reaches of the fall are hidden from view altogether. Hidden; and how? By the great heaped-up pile of waters that seems to stand a solid mountain fronting the Fall itself. Water all, but veiled in eternal mist of spray—the whole mountain, but the rebound of the waters from above striking the waters below and hurled by the concussion a hundred feet into the air—a solid mountain of water, for ever impenetrable by the eye, in every new minute built up from new supplies, yet hiding for ever to those who stand upon the shore the central reaches of the Fall. And then on beyond again, lucent green and shining white, breadth after breadth of the Fall itself, the wooded islet, and then breadth after breadth of the Fall again.

The impression of mass, of force, of power that one receives is, I have said, beyond the conveyance of speech. Stand minute by minute, hour by hour, beside these Falls, gaze on them from above, float out to them from below on the brave little steamboat that confronts them without fear, pass down on to the shelving, slippery rocks that lie inside the waters, between them and the cliff itself, and there grows and grows upon you a sense of a power there manifested, a power not of man, not of the waters themselves, but of some unseen presence commanding the whole, sustaining it, res raining it, guiding it from the Great Lakes on its way to the Atlantic Ocean, which perhaps no other spectacle in nature—save a storm at sea—can impress with like vivid intensity upon the mind. In your ear rings the voice of the many waters, the voice of mighty thunders, saying: "Alleluja, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Omnipotent, yes, for even we, say the mighty waters, are but the creatures of His will. Reigneth, yes, for every inch of our course is by Him commanded, every leap and bound of our rejoicing is of His almighty ordering.

Reducing this force and energy of the Niagara Falls to terms of human traffic, they say that it would suffice, if converted into motive power, to keep all the mills and factories of the American continent in motion—all the mills and factories which the American people will ever need, however much in their great prosperity they may increase and multiply in the land. It is the most concentrated and tremendous exhibition of physical force—this Niagara Fall—which God has set before men on the face of this little planet.

And yet it is the exhibition only of the force that is there peculiar. There is the same force carried in the bosom of those waters before and after that wild and prodigious leap which concentrates our attention when we think of them, the same force not only in the grim and deadly rapids immediately above and below, but also in the still waters of the Great Lakes which do not yet suspect the fate that lies before them. What is new in Niagara Falls is not the forces that are in the waters, but that sudden change in the balance of forces which gives rise to the stupendous phenomena, whence they draw their great renown.

Force impresses itself on the eye and ear only when changes of its disposition are taking place. But force is always there, even when equilibrium is perfect, and all is motionless. For equilibrium means nothing else than that force is balanced against force, so that neither can overcome the other, like two schoolboys each pushing his comrade, yet neither able to prevail. Each one of us bears on every square inch of his body a weight of fifteen pounds of air; but because the pressure in one direction is balanced by an equal pressure exactly opposite, we go about our daily business carrying on our shoulders this tremendous weight, pressed on every side by this prodigious force, unconscious and unoppressed. There are depths of the Atlantic Ocean which no plummet has ever sounded, and on every square inch of that league-deep bottom is reared a column of water whose weight is many tons. Yet tender creatures live their day there undisturbed, the ocean water within balances the ocean without, and all the superincumbent seas have not power so much as to begin to crush them.

And so in like manner all through this outspread universe of God's. It is here and there, now and again, that to sense of ear and eye the mighty forces which He wields reveal themselves. Here and there only, now and then alone. For only when they are not in equilibrium, not balancing each other, does their pageant paint itself for our vision or their chorused chant ring out: "Alleluja, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" And when we meet with still and silent nature, we are not in like manner conscious of the giant forces which are involved even in the rearing of a daisy blossom above the sward or the ripple on the face of the pond when the gnat has touched its surface:

No man can see a meteor flash across the sky, or the lightning rend the clouds, or Vesuvius burst into lurid flame, or the avalanche thunder to the valley, or Niagara fling its stupendous weight of waters down the steep without thrilling to the sense of a present power, whether he call it God, or Nature, or Physical Energy, or by any strange name whatsoever, before which the physical force of man is impotent as a reed shaken in the wind. Then and there God wakes us to His presence, though till then we have been slumbering. But we want so to tend and train the finer qualities of the inner man that also in the still and steadfast balance of natural forces by which we are surrounded in common places and on common days we shall feel the thrill of God, and know in our hearts the Divine might which cradles us from first to last. The balanced pull of globe on globe by which the planet holds its ordered place needs God no less than the flight of some meteoric fragment across the heavens: And the steady pressure of the contents of Loch Lomond on its rocky bottom needs God no less than the hurling of a myriad cataracts from the brow of Niagara cliff.

And it is in the moral world as in the physical. Often the forces that show the most and that sound the most are not therefore truly in the sight of God most potent. They that seem to win the world with a rush are not necessarily doing God and man most service. There are others whose whole strength is given to resisting some force of evil, and so the sole result of their labour is to keep the world at balance, and men passing them by think they are doing nothing. To estimate the toils of men and the power in them you must count not only how many paces the world has gone forward by their high service, but also how many paces the world would have gone back but for their devotion: If sometimes we, friends and lovers of truth, of liberty, of religion, to adopt the noble triad of good words which is engraved on the dedication-stone of our new buildings at Oxford—if sometimes we feel as if neither we nor our fathers had been able to do much for the world, let us reflect that no man knows what headway priestcraft and bigotry and superstition might have made in these latter times if our tongues had been content with silence and our pens had not been wielded. To make the world more pure and holy that is indeed high service; it is service not less high, though very much less conspicuous, to keep it from falling back from what purity and holiness it has attained;

Yet, after all, philosophise as we may, in the spiritual world, and the physical, too, it is the forces that make swift change, the forces exhibited in the passing from one stage of equilibrium to another, that quicken the imagination and make the heart beat faster in recognition that God is there. A Garibaldi winning liberty for Italy, a Lincoln wiping out the stain of slavery, a Cobden setting free the currents of commerce, a Luther enfranchising the souls of all the Teutonic world, these are forces great, visible, striking, and we cry out that God was in these men. They impress us because they moved the world. And other men as strong, as brave, as pure, who yet worked less conspicuously, cannot kindle us to so high an inspiration. And in like manner Nature, not in equipoise, but in mighty movement, most quickens our pulse and wins us to recognition of the God omnipotent who reigns, pouring the waters from the mountainside or stirring them up to tempestuous tumult on the face of the great deep. And so once more I would to God that I could give you the look and feel and touch of the monarch cataract of our world, or that any orator or artist or poet could; for then I know you would hear, in the noise of those clashing torrents, now hurled to the base of the cliff, then leaping in their strength from the cauldron towards the skies, the mighty psalm of praise in which for ten thousand years they have never paused: "Alleluja, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Amen;

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

PRESENTATION TO MR. S. S. TAYLER.

ON the occasion of the sixty-third anniversary of the Sunday School, celebrated last Sunday, November 4, an event of great interest to past and present teachers took place at the close of the morning service. In April last Mr. S. S. Tayler retired from the hon. secretaryship of the school, which he had held for thirty-two years, and on Sunday an illuminated address signed by one hundred past and present teachers and officers of the Sunday School was presented to him. The Rev. W. L. Tucker, on behalf of former ministers and teachers, alluded to Mr. Tayler's long connection with Stamford-street, and asked his acceptance of the Address as a slight token of the esteem in which he was held by all. Among the signatures to the Address are the Rev. T. L. Marshall, Mrs. Spears, Rev. T. Dunkerley, Rev. Copeland and Mrs. Bowie, Rev. Wm. Jellie (of Auckland, N.Z.), Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. A. H. Biggs, Mr. Roby Waterall, Miss Annie Preston, Miss M. Bridgett, Mr. W. H. Abraham, Mr. George Callow, and Mr. Councillor J. Welch.

Mr. Tayler, in reply, referred to his long connection with Stamford Street Chapel and School, and emphasised the fact that the scholars who had passed through the school had been trained in a free faith, unhampered by the dogmas taught in orthodox schools.

The terms of the Address were as follows:—

"DEAR MR. TAYLER,—Your retirement from the office of secretary of the Sunday School at Stamford-street, after thirty-one years of faithful and devoted service, cannot be allowed to pass without expressing to you the high appreciation and sincere gratitude of the numerous band of teachers and workers who in days gone by and at the present time have had their lives enriched by your generous encouragement and unfailing sympathy.

Municipal Government, Working Men's Clubs, Charitable Societies, Unitarian Organisations, and many other public objects have occupied much of your time and thought during your long and honoured life, and have received from you unselfish and unstinted service. In the midst of many engagements, care for the little children has always been a conspicuous feature of your work. The progress of the Sunday School at Stamford-street has been to you a subject of warm personal interest. To help to make the lives of the children brighter and sweeter has been with you a supreme aim; you have laboured in the faith that as people grow wiser and better the world will become more like a Kingdom of Heaven upon earth.

"We hope that in your old age you will be cheered by the knowledge that you have lived and worked for the good of others. Many of those whose names are appended to this address owe to you a great debt of gratitude for stimulus and sympathy in their life and work."

Mr. Tayler's written reply was as follows:—

"My word of reply is to heartily thank you for your kind recognition of my humble services.

"There is nothing so really good and valuable as the sympathy and approval of one's brethren. God shines, if we only would try and see it, in all His works, but He speaks through the voices of men.

"That the Stamford Street Sunday School should change its secretary is not an everyday event. Mr. W. N. Green started in 1843, and helped for thirty-one years. Thirty-two years ago by his death the office was vacant, and I took it up temporarily.

"I deem it a great privilege to have been able to give some assistance to your valuable and important work.

"To feed the growing intelligence of the young minds with knowledge, and interest them in the grander and higher side of their natures is a first step to bring them in touch with the more matured thoughts from the pulpit.

"In retiring from work, it is gratifying to feel that it will not cease, but continue in the hands of one who has youth and energy to watch and make the most of all coming opportunities.

"To curb selfishness and to give time and energy to helping others in the promotion of their well-being is really the most profitable path to travel in this little bit of never-ceasing time allotted to us.

"Pray accept the thanks and blessing of your old co-worker, and the trust that your careers may be full of joyfulness and brightness."

LAI D ASIDE:

Lying waiting, listening ever
To the busy stream of life;
Lying watching, sharing never
Its tempestuous joy and strife;
Lying, stifling down the yearning
In the world's keen race to run;
Lying waiting, slowly learning
The short prayer "Thy will be done."
Lying waiting, till the shadows
Of earth's changing clouds shall pass,
They will pass as in the meadows
Moving softly o'er the grass;
God perchance to such is teaching
More than they can know or guess, Giving their souls time for reaching
After truth and holiness.
Father, help them in the hollow
Of Thy hand in trust to lie,
While their spirits rise and follow
Christ, until their self-will die!

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

SINCE the date of the annual meeting of the Association in June, the Executive Committee have held three meetings, and various sub-committees have met eleven times. There are now twenty-four members of committee, nearly all of whom serve on two or more sub-committees. Each sub-committee has its own chairman, and the appointments for 1906-7 are as follows:—Finance, Mr. Ion Pritchard; Home Mission Work, Rev. Charles Roper; Foreign Mission Work, Rev. V. D. Davis; Publications, Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Scottish Work, Rev. James Harwood; Civil Rights and Trusts, Dr. W. Blake Odgers; General Purposes and Meetings, Rev. F. W. Stanley. Secretaries of congregations and of district societies are reminded that applications involving expenditure are first considered and reported upon by one of the sub-committees before any action is taken by the Executive Committee; and it is necessary, therefore, that correspondence should reach the Secretary ten days before the second Wednesday in the month, the date on which the Executive Committee meet.

FINANCE.

The income for the nine months ending September 30, 1906, was as follows:—Subscriptions, £3,748; collections, £109; investments, £1,025; book-room department, £1,116; special income, £64; making in all, £6,062. The expenditure for the same period was as follows:—Home and foreign grants, £3,213; publications, £1,016; meetings, £83; salaries of book-room and office staff, £619; office expenses, £137; making in all, £5,068. The balance in hand at the beginning of October has since been expended in grants to churches and in the payment of accounts for printing.

There are a few unpaid subscriptions to receive, but the chief remaining source of income for the current year is the Association Sunday Collections in November. It is to be hoped that other pressing claims will not prevent a generous response to the appeal made to the churches by the Committee. Unitarians who give liberally to missionary work are usually the most generous in the support of their own churches. Congregations which give nothing outside often end in giving little inside. There are still a few congregations which have not yet had a collection on behalf of the missionary activities of the Association; perhaps this year they will "take a thought and mend."

The stability of the Association rests chiefly upon the subscription list; and, unfortunately, the losses by death have been very serious of late. Upwards of £300 in annual subscriptions have in this way been lost during recent months; and the discontinuance of several special subscriptions, promised for three or four years, will involve a further loss of upwards of £500. The Committee can only point to the work they are doing, and make their appeal to Unitarians throughout the country to make good these losses, so that there may be no curtailment of useful work.

The donations this year have so far only reached £13. A legacy of £100 has been received from the executors of the late Miss Caroline Teschemacher, of London; and £200 from the estate of the late Dr. John Cameron of Liverpool. It is gratifying to find the members of the Association thus remembering its work when making their wills.

PUBLICATIONS.

There has been great activity of late in the publication department. The following new books have been issued since the last meeting of the Council:—"The Religion of Nature and of Human Experience," by Rev. W. J. Jupp; "The Making of Religion," by Rev. S. M. Crothers; "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," a translation with introduction and notes by Rev. J. Edwin Odgers; "A Short Unitarian History," by Rev. F. B. Mott; "Memorable Unitarians," a series of brief biographies; also new editions of "The Bible, what it is and is not," by Rev. Joseph Wood; "God and the Soul," by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong; and a fourth edition of "The First Three Gospels, their Origin and Relations," by Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Twenty-four sermons by Unitarian ministers have now been issued; they can be had separately or bound in two volumes, each containing twelve sermons. Of the new series of Unitarian tracts fifty numbers have been published, and there are others to follow. Several of the tracts are reprints of old favourites, the demand for which still continues; others by English and American writers are published for the first time. The paper, printing, and general "get-up" of the new series are an improvement upon previous series issued by the Association. The Committee are prepared from time to time to make free grants of copies of these tracts to ministers and congregations, so that inquirers may obtain information respecting the religious beliefs and teachings of Unitarians. There are also probably not a few people connected with our churches, particularly young men and women, who would gain instruction and enlightenment by reading some of the tracts. Several of them are brief and written in simple language, others are more elaborate and scholarly. The first twenty-four tracts have been issued also in two volumes, under the titles of "What do Unitarians Believe and Teach?" and "The Religion and Theology of Unitarians." The Pocket Almanac and the Year Book for 1907 are now in course of preparation, and additions or corrections should be forwarded to Essex Hall without delay.

The Committee have pleasure in announcing that they will publish in January, in two volumes, the sermons by Dr. Martineau, "Endeavours after the Christian Life." The books will be added to the series of Sixpenny Reprints. Dr. Channing's discourses, "The Perfect Life," will also be published shortly in the same series. The sales of publications, so far as the general public are concerned, have increased; and when ministers and secretaries of congregations take a little trouble the sales among Unitarians are increased.

Since the meeting of the Council in March grants of 2,459 books and 50,599 tracts have been made to libraries, ministers, congregations, postal missions, and private individuals in Great Britain and Ireland, to the value of £285; while 1,258 books and 10,786 tracts, to the value of £88, have been distributed in response to applications from foreign countries. It is interesting to report that among the applicants were fifty-four ministers of so-called "orthodox" churches.

HOME MISSION WORK.

In addition to the grants for the year 1906, already reported to the Council, the following have been voted towards the salaries of ministers:—Aberdare (Highland-Place) at the rate of £25, Blackburn up to £75 on the appointment of a minister, Bradford (West Bowling) £50, Chorlton and Urmston £60, Darlington £60, Peckham £45, Plymouth £35, Portsmouth £40, Wolverhampton £65. For pulpit supplies the following grants have been made:—Ansdell £10, Darlington £10, Devonport £10, Newport (Mon.) £12, Ravara £10, Seven Kings (Ilford) £10, Wimbledon £15. For special services and lectures:—Bath £12, Baintree £10, Canterbury £12, Cardiff £5, Carlisle £5, Doncaster £10, Douglas £10, Hollymount £10, Ipswich £10, Loughborough £2, Norwich £10, Oldbury £2, Scarborough £5, Southend £10, Walthamstow £5, Windermere £10, Yarmouth £5. Several of these grants are for services and lectures organised by the district societies. Assistance has also been promised for missionary work which the Manchester District Association and the Western Union have in contemplation. For new church buildings, repairs and alterations to existing buildings, and other purposes:—Ashton £100, Attercliffe up to £50, Belfast (York-street) £30, Bradford (West Bowling) £100, Chatham £10, Fails-worth (Manchester) last £50, Glenarm £10, Islington (London) £50, Knutsford £20, Rawtenstall £10, Southampton £20, Walmsley £50 when £950 raised. The circumstances vary greatly, but in every case the committee insist on the congregations contributing generously from their own resources before appealing to the public for aid.

Taking advantage of the visit of Dr. Crothers, the committee made arrangements for him to deliver week-evening lectures during October at Leicester, Norwich, Bolton, Gee Cross, Sheffield, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Newcastle-on-Tyne. The lectures were largely attended and evoked deep interest. The committee are sorry that they were unable, owing to his numerous engagements, to arrange for Dr. Crothers to visit other towns up and down the country. He will carry with him on his return to America the gratitude and good wishes of a large circle of friends in England and Scotland.

Twenty other places have been visited by special preachers provided by the Association, and arrangements are in progress for lectures and special services in different parts of the country. Whenever possible, the committee prefer that arrangements should be made by the district and local societies, and they are always ready to consider recommendations or suggestions which come to them through these societies.

The efforts now being made to form Unitarian congregations at Blackburn, Newport (Mon.), and Wimbledon have met with a hearty response; and if only an earnest, active, capable missionary minister were settled at each of these places there is every prospect of establishing, in due course, a self-supporting congregation.

The Unitarian services at Cambridge for the summer term ended in June, and were opened for the autumn term on October 14, when Rev. John Page Hopps was the preacher. Several of those who took a deep interest in the services have left Cambridge, but happily their places have been taken by fresh comers. In a great University city these services may well have a deep and far-reaching influence on the young men and women who attend them, and the Committee believe they are justified in incurring the expenditure involved in carrying them on.

Rev. T. P. Spedding will submit a report to the Council of the work of the Unitarian Van Mission which extended from May to October. One hundred and forty meetings were held in Lancashire and Yorkshire, with an estimated total attendance of 25,000 people. The Committee made a small grant of money towards the expenses, and supplied 13,490 Unitarian tracts for distribution among inquirers. It is evident that there is a great field for Unitarian propaganda all over the country, and the Committee have under consideration the question of how they can best assist this new movement, so that full advantage may be taken of the opportunities for missionary work which now present themselves.

SCOTTISH WORK.

With the view of further assisting in maintaining and diffusing the principles of Unitarian Christianity in Scotland, a conference of ministers and delegates of congregations was held at Glasgow on October 22. All the churches were represented at the meeting, and various suggestions were made respecting new methods of missionary work, which will receive the attention of the McQuaker trustees. A strong desire was expressed that a Unitarian Van should be utilised in Scotland; as there were hundreds of towns and villages in which the message of Unitarianism had never yet been delivered.

Special services were held at several of the churches; Dr. Crothers preached at Aberdeen and lectured at Glasgow; Dr. Carpenter preached and lectured in connection with the opening of the new handsome church building at Aberdeen in September. Sunday services and week-evening theological lectures will be delivered at Aberdeen, Dundee, and Kirkcaldy in November by Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, Rev. H. Gow, of London, and Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool. Arrangements will probably be made for a further course after Christmas at other churches in Scotland. Rev. E. T. Russell has arranged to deliver a short course of Unitarian lectures at Govan, and other places in the neighbourhood of Glasgow.

The Committee of the Scottish Unitarian Association have decided to sell the church property in Clerk's-lane, Kilmarnock. The building is far too large, it is in want of extensive and costly repairs, and is situated in an unsuitable part of the town. Rev. William Wilson has resigned his ministry there, but pulpit supplies will be provided by the McQuaker trustees for a time, pending further developments. It is hoped that the price obtained for the Clerk's-lane property may enable the Scottish Association to pay off the mortgage of £600, and leave a substantial balance which, if the congregation shows signs of life and progress, may be applied to the erection of a new hall or church.

The Postal Mission work in Scotland is under the general superintendence of Rev. Alex. Webster. He recently prepared a valuable tract, "The Revolt against Calvinism within the Scotch Churches," which the McQuaker trustees published. This tract, and a large number of other tracts have been widely circulated. Mr. Webster has received many interesting communications from correspondents in all parts of Scotland. Ministers, congregations, public libraries, and religious inquirers have been supplied with Unitarian literature from Essex Hall in response to applications which have been received.

COLONIAL AND FOREIGN WORK.

There are at the present time four students, aided by the Association, who are studying at Manchester College, Oxford, in preparation for religious work in their own countries—Mr. F. Sinclair (New Zealand), Mr. C. Raffay (Hungary), Mr. S. Haldar (India), Mr. R. Nagai (Japan). Arrangements are under consideration by which students from abroad will be better able to utilise their vacations in gaining a knowledge of the practical work of our churches and missions.

The new Unitarian Church at Wellington, New Zealand, under the ministry of the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, continues to make excellent progress; it has already become a great power for good in the community. The attendance in the evening often reaches four hundred people. At Hobart, Tasmania, the little group of Unitarians meet regularly for worship, and it is believed that if a minister were appointed a self-supporting Unitarian Church could be established in the course of a few years.

The Liberal Protestants of France are busily organising their forces in view of the legal changes that have recently taken place, by which State aid is withdrawn from their churches. In response to an application for help, supported by Professor Bonet-Maury and Professor Jean Reville, a grant of £100 was made to assist the poorer churches in the mountainous district of the Cevennes, the home, to a large extent, of the liberal religious movement in France.

The missionary work which the Association has carried on for several years in India proceeds on much the same lines. The demand for Unitarian literature continues unabated. At Allahabad, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras, earnest capable workers attend to the correspondence and supply applicants with literature from Essex Hall. Mr. Chakrabarti is now organising postal mission work in Assam and the Khasi Hills districts. Pundit Sastri's admirable address at Benares on "Theism in India" has been published as a tract, also a brief statement of the religious principles of the Brahmo Samaj. A translation of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's book, "God and the Soul," into Urdu (the literary language of the Mohammedans of India) is in course of preparation. It is hoped to translate and publish two or three Unitarian tracts for widespread circulation among educated and thoughtful people in Japan.

There are opportunities for Unitarian missionary work in all parts of the world. Few weeks pass without inquiries coming to Essex Hall from lands far remote from England from people who are seeking a larger, deeper, truer religious faith than is contained in the dogmas and ecclesiasticism of "orthodox" churches. The Committee, by means of literature and in other ways endeavour to meet the needs of these earnest seekers after truth.

MEETINGS AND DEPUTATIONS.

Through the courtesy of the minister and congregation at Mill Hill, Leeds, supported by the committee of the Yorkshire Union, the Autumnal Meetings of the Association were held at Leeds on October 19 and 20. The meetings were interesting and helpful, excellent addresses were delivered, an earnest spirit prevailed, and the papers on the missionary work read at the Conference were thoroughly practical and suggestive. At Bradford there was a large attendance at the opening religious service of the new Unitarian Church at West Bowling, of which the Rev. William Rosling is the minister. The public meeting in the evening was also largely attended, and there were evidences of an awakened spirit of devotion and zeal which should quicken the life and work of our churches and societies throughout Yorkshire.

The Association was represented at the annual meetings of the Eastern Union, the Manchester District Association, the London and South Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, the Southern Association, the South East Wales Society, the Western Union; at the opening of new church buildings at Attercliffe, Capel-y-fadfa, and Pontypridd; also at the bi-centenary meetings of the church at Rotherham, and at several important congregational gatherings.

The Association was represented at the anniversary meetings of the Swiss Verein at Chur, by the Rev. E. W. Lummis. These opportunities for the interchange of thought among Liberal religious workers in other lands are greatly prized by the Committee.

Preparations are now in progress for the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers at Boston, U.S.A., next September. In America, a representative committee are making arrangements for the reception of delegates, and it is expected that a large number will attend from Great Britain and Ireland. Information respecting the order of proceedings and the cost of the journey will be published soon.

Dr. Herbert Smith, owing to illness from which he is happily recovering, will not be able to give so much time and attention to the appeal for funds as he had hoped, but the Laymen's Club, in co-operation with the Foreign Mission Sub-Committee of the Association will attend to the work so enthusiastically initiated by Dr. Herbert Smith, who will continue the Treasurer-ship. A statement will shortly be issued with an appeal for additional funds so as to secure the attendance of as large a number of ministers as possible. It is gratifying to learn that several members of our churches hope to be present at the International meetings at Boston.

DECEASED MEMBERS.

It is with deep regret that the Committee report the death of honoured members of the Association. Mr. William Colfox, of Bridport, was one of the most generous supporters of the Association, for many years the largest annual subscriber, and at all times ready to give the most careful attention to any scheme of Unitarian missionary work which was submitted to him. As long as his health permitted, he regularly attended the anniversary meetings in London. Dr. John Cameron, of Liverpool, Mr. A. Currer Briggs, of Leeds, Mrs. George Buckton, of Oxford, were liberal subscribers to the Association, and generous supporters of our churches and societies. In the death of Mr. A. M. Bose, of Calcutta, the leading layman of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj, the Rev. J. C. Woods, the founder of the Unitarian Church at Adelaide, and Dr. Albert Réville, the distinguished professor of the History of Religion at the College of France, the Committee have to mourn the loss of faithful and noble men who rendered invaluable services to pure religion in the spirit of perfect freedom. To the relatives and friends of the deceased, the Committee desire to tender their respectful sympathy.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SIR,—Your correspondence columns last week contained two very pathetic letters. One was headed "Isolated Churches," the other "A Church for the Solitary." My sympathy is with the writers of both these letters. They state our problem in Yorkshire. I could tell the tale of more than one congregation in the country which suffers from exactly the same cause as that at Carlisle, so touchingly described by its energetic minister—isolation. We do our best to overcome the difficulty. We endeavour, by grants of money, by correspondence, and by visitation, to help them to realise that they have a vital connection with a larger body—the Church of the Liberal Faith. But when we have said and done all, they remain in their separate localities a feeble band of earnest folk who, for conscience sake, maintain their religious fellowship apart from the popular churches, refuse to go the easy way, and deny themselves social advantages because they cannot pretend what they do not believe. They excite our sympathy and admiration for their loyalty and veracity in these times of indifference and easy compromise.

As for the plea for "A Church for the Solitary," you will remember that I referred in my letter, a year ago, to the attempt I had made to organise such a church. At considerable expense I had sought, by advertising and other methods, to discover those in Yorkshire who are similarly situated to your correspondent from Suffolk. The result was most unsatisfactory. The advertisements and letters which appeared in the denominational and local papers did not bring more than half-a-dozen replies. With these solitary souls I keep up regular communication. No doubt there are thousands, living in places remote from our churches, who would welcome this ministry if we could but get into touch with them. We can only establish such contact, I am now convinced, through such agencies as the Postal and Van Missions. I again renew the offer to minister, by the written and printed word, and by personal visitation to such isolated liberal thinkers in Yorkshire, who will let me know of their existence and need.

Your full report of the recent autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Sunday School Association, held at Leeds and Bradford, gave your readers an account of some of the most important doings in this district. We were glad to welcome the deputation from London and representatives of our churches from distant parts. The meetings were well attended, considering that the time for their arrangement was so brief. The speeches at the public meeting and at the conferences were excellent in tone and quality. Our visitors were favourably impressed, and we were greatly encouraged by the inspiring meetings.

By far the most important event that has occurred in recent years in connection with the Unitarian movement in Yorkshire, has been the opening of the new church at Broadway-avenue, Bradford. It is only about nine months since Rev. W. Rosling resigned his pastorate of the Ryan-street Congregational Church, on account of the intolerable strain put upon him by those who sought to limit his freedom to utter the truth as it was revealed to him. On his resignation some forty members of the congregation also seceded. Both minister and people went out into the wilderness without, at the time, clear prospect of the promised land. Their great determination was that they would be free to welcome truth, as it was revealed to them, and to worship God without mental reservations. They soon found that they were in hearty accord with our position. They held services under the leadership of their revered pastor in hired halls under serious disadvantages. They gathered the children together and formed a Sunday-school. They made such progress as a church that it was imperative that a religious home should be provided for them before the winter. With astonishing rapidity a church building has been erected and the cost all but raised, and on October 20 it was dedicated to the worship of God and the service of man. The crowded assembly, which participated in the ceremony, was a sign of the new enthusiasm which is coming into our work in Yorkshire.

When we think of our achievements since the century opened, we have good cause for encouragement. The united effort for the County Bazaar realised over £4,000 for mission and propagandist work. A new church has been built at Selby to take the place of the old dilapidated meeting-house. A new congregation has been established at Attercliffe, Sheffield, and a school-church built at a cost of £1,800; and the new church at Broadway-avenue, Bradford, cost £1,300. All this shows that the old spirit of loyalty to our cause still exists, and will be responsive to the call for sacrifice in the interest of the promotion of truth and religion.

We are on the forward way. We have recently made tentative efforts at Barnsley and Harrogate. Barnsley, with a population of 40,000, seemed to offer a fair field for our gospel. It is midway between Leeds and Sheffield, and, if a church could be established there, it would be a good meeting-ground for the members of our churches in these two important centres. Services have been regularly held there on Sunday evenings during the last twelve months. The results have not been as good as we could wish, but we have gathered a nucleus of thoughtful earnest and reverent people who appreciate our message, and who yet might develop into a church.

At Harrogate the recent summer services have discovered a number of resident Unitarians. These and the visitors have appreciated the opportunity of meeting in the fellowship of worship. Some of the residents desire to associate for lectures and social intercourse during the winter months, and they would like to have services arranged next summer. There is good prospect that, if a suitable building could be provided, a church could be established at Harrogate. There is a resident population of nearly 30,000. Unitarians from Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and other places take up residence there. And there is a constant flow of visitors from all parts of the country during the summer months. A combined effort to establish a congregation at Harrogate would in my opinion be a worthy enterprise which would be justified by results.

Some of the most successful of the meetings of the Van Mission were in the towns and villages of Yorkshire, and the missionaries have with one accord given glowing reports of their experience. At Skipton, Bingley, Shipley, and Heckmond-wike audiences of from 500 to 1,000, composed chiefly of men, gathered night after night, and listened with reverent and respectful attention to our message. The questions put at the close of the address were of immense value. They revealed to the missionaries what men in the churches and in the streets were thinking about religion. They convinced me at all events that there are at least three classes of people who need what we have to give—(1) those who are still held in the meshes of the old orthodoxy, who regard the Bible as an oracle, who are living in a sixteenth-century world, and whose views of God and man and man's destiny belong to that old time. These need enlightenment on the results of Biblical criticism; they need the Gospel of the Dignity of Human Nature and the larger thought of God—these for their soul's peace, and as a stimulus to worthy endeavour. (2) A second class which needs our message is composed of those who are vainly trying to put the new thought into the old symbols, and to remain in the orthodox folds after having discarded the orthodox thought. We have to plead with them to be sincere. They need the Gospel of Veracity. It is a degradation of their manhood to repeat creeds and to sing hymns in the solemn act of worship which in their heart of hearts they disbelieve. There are multitudes in this position in every community. They cannot be truly happy in a religious fellowship where they are compelled to make mental reservation. It is our duty to show them that with us there is freedom to grow without loss of faith: (3) A third class, which is an ever-increasing class, is composed of those who are imbued with the new ideas which come from modern investigation. They cannot reconcile these new ideas with dogmatic theology. The language of the churches is foreign to their everyday thinking. Religion, as presented by the churches, with its anthropomorphism, doctrines of atonement and redemption, and its acceptance of the miraculous, &c., is unreal. They vote religion, therefore, a sham and a delusion. They have got out of touch with the churches and forsaken the habit of worship. Yet, for the most part, they are good men and true who have the interest and well-being of their fellow-men at heart, and are actively engaged in work for social betterment. These men would be helped by the presentation of a reasonable Gospel such as we can give. It is our duty to go out to them, in a frank and open manner, and share with them that which has been to us an inspiration and a strength.

I believe the Van Mission has done effective service in this direction already. It is our purpose in Yorkshire to go over the ground again, and invite such as care to hear our Gospel to meet us in public halls. Arrangements with that in view are in hand, as a start, at one or two places where the Van Mission was most successful—e.g., Skipton and Shipley. We begin a course of lectures at Skipton on November 20.

It would be good to contemplate the founding of churches in such places as these. We shall do so, no doubt, if our experiments show satisfactory results. But in all new enterprises we must be careful to avoid mistakes such as have been made in the past. We must be careful to avoid the multiplication of weak and struggling churches which are an irksome burden to the central organisation. Whilst, therefore, there may not be any marked increase in church extension, there still may be a gathering of little groups of people in many places who, by our literature and such personal service as we can render, shall be helped to larger thought and better life.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Blackpool: South Shore.—At the annual meeting of the congregation held October 29 it was decided nem. com. that the name of the building be "The Unitarian Free Church."

Dover.—On October 30 and 31, a most successful sale of work was held in Adrian-street Church vestry, in connection with the Ladies' Sewing Guild, under the able management of Mrs. Edward Marsh.

Hinckley.—On Wednesday evening, October 31, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie delivered the third lecture of the series at the Great Meeting. Mr. Bowie's discourse was exceedingly interesting, and was listened to with keen interest, by a very good congregation. Colonel

E. C. Atkins, J.P., took the chair, and the minister of the church took the introductory service.

Hull (Memorial).—A brass tablet framed in marble subscribed by the members of the Hull Literary Club was unveiled last Saturday afternoon at the Park-street Church, in memory of Mr. Donald Wilson, B.A. Oxon., who was for many years the valued secretary of the club. Mr. Hubert Johnson, president of the club, in unveiling the tablet, spoke warmly of what Mr. Wilson had done for the club during the eleven or more years of his membership, for seven of which he had been one of the hon. secretaries. They were often conscious that he carried on his work under great difficulty, but yet Mr. Wilson never permitted himself to be disheartened. It was given to few to possess such a brave and generous personality, so full of courtesy, cheerfulness, tolerance, kindness, and sympathy, combined with true manliness and unflinching fidelity to his high ideals which made him a type of a true Christian gentleman. Mr. S. Harris, on behalf of the trustees of the church, in accepting the tablet, said that Mr. Donald Wilson had been a member of that congregation from his very birth. There were boys and girls who would never forget the lessons they had learned from him.

London: Bermondsey.—Mr. Jesse Hipperston, who is now in charge of the Port-road Church, appeals for two more teachers for the Sunday-school, and also for help for Saturday evening concerts. He asks whether any musical friends will volunteer either to take part in a programme or to come down with a small party and occupy the whole evening?

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—Friends of the above mission will be pleased to hear that Mr. James Welch, an ardent worker for many years, was again returned a member of the Southwark Borough Council in the Progressive interest after a keen contest.

London: Brixton.—On Tuesday, November 6, a concert and operetta were given in the Effra-road school-room in aid of the Brixton Cot at Winifred House. In spite of the very heavy rain, the room was well filled. The first part was contributed by Miss J. Epps, Mr. John Harrison, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Appleby. The operetta which followed, entitled "The Enchanted Glen," had been prepared by the girls' club under the direction of the Misses Abraham and Hopkins, with the assistance of Miss Jarvis. The accompaniment was played by Miss Hilda Stanley (piano), Miss A. de Negri and Mr. F. de Negri (violins), scenic help being rendered by Messrs. Abraham, Harris, and Watts. Twenty-six children took part, and all acquitted themselves very well, the singing of some of the solos being especially good. The acting and general efficiency of the performers reflected great credit upon the teachers who trained them. The Social and Literary Union commenced its season on October 3 with a soirée, which was well attended, and furnished with a capital programme. A very animated discussion arose on "The State Maintenance of Children," introduced by Mrs. Raphael, on October 17, and on the 31st Mr. Martinelli read a most interesting paper on "Shakespeare—an Interpretation."

London: Mansford-street.—The thirty ninth annual meeting of past and present scholars, teachers, and workers of the Spicer-street and Mansford-street Missions was held on Wednesday evening. The schoolroom was decorated with evergreens and cut flowers, kindly provided by Lady Durning-Lawrence, Mrs. Crompton Jones, and Mr. E. B. Squire. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, on behalf of the present teachers and scholars, gave a hearty welcome to the visitors, among whom were his predecessor, the Rev. John Ellis, and Miss Upton. There was a large attendance of old and present scholars, teachers, and workers, and a most enjoyable evening was spent.

London: Peckham.—A social meeting of the Avondale road congregation was held on Tuesday, the 6th inst., to welcome the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., to a six months' tenure of the pulpit of this church. Though the attendance was affected by the exceedingly inclement weather, a pleasant and profitable evening was spent by those present in the interchange of views regarding a more systematic prosecution of the work. Mr. Critchley emphasised the need for loyal support from every member of the congregation.

Manchester: Moss Side.—On Saturday last, November 3, a soirée was held, to which all members and friends had received an anonymous invitation. During the evening the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, who presided, in a short speech announced that the soirée was the outcome of a wish of the church treasurer, Mr. Wm. Taylor, to celebrate his sixtieth birthday in this way. The news was received with loud cheers and congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor. Mr. Taylor made a suitable reply.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas-street.—There was a large gathering of Foresters in the General Baptist Chapel on Sunday week, when the district treasurer, Brother T. Bond, minister of the chapel, preached a special sermon, and a collection was made for the Albert Cottages.

Southend-on-Sea.—The first anniversary of the settlement of Mr. Delta Evans as minister of the Unitarian Church was happily signalled last Sunday evening by the opening of a new organ. The ceremony took place before service, and the organ was opened by Mr. W. J. Noel, of Stratford, in the regretted absence of Mr. John Harrison through indisposition. Mr. Evans stated that through the generosity of London friends, added to the proceeds of the bazaar of May, the organ was opened free of debt. Mr. Harrison, who had taken the kindest practical interest in their purchase, had promised to come down and give a recital on some other occasion. Having opened the organ, Mr. Noel gave a brief recital, and the service then proceeded. In the course of his sermon Mr. Evans spoke of his experiences during the past year as minister of the church, and the earnest purpose and good-hope with which he entered on the new period of service, and then dwelt upon the power of music in religious worship.

WEST BOWLING NEW CHURCH.

READERS of The INQUIRER will recollect that in January last the Rev. W. ROSLING and between 50 and 60 of his people seceded from Ryan-street Congregational Church, West Bowling, Bradford, and formed themselves into a Unitarian Church. They were unable to secure suitable rooms in which to conduct services and carry on Sunday School work.

The Yorkshire U.U. came to their aid, purchasing a site for a new Church at a cost of £250. An appeal to Yorkshire Unitarians realised the sum of £798. The British and Foreign generously granted £100, which, with £50 given by Sir Ed. Durning-Lawrence at the opening ceremony, and £12 from outside friends, brings the total to £1,210.

The entire cost of the new Church amounts to about £1,310, which leaves a deficit of £100.

We now appeal with confidence to the wider circle of friends reached by The INQUIRER to enable us to clear this debt.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Thursday the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, happily celebrated his eightieth birthday, and friends throughout the country will join, as we do, in the heartiest congratulations on that occasion. The members of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and of the Widows' Fund, presented addresses of congratulation and warm tribute to Mr. Steinthal for his long and faithful services, on the afternoon of that day. The time has rendered it impossible for us to report the occasion this week, and we were not allowed to print the addresses beforehand, but we hope for a full report next week. In our present issue will be found a tribute to another of our veterans, who wears the crown not merely of eighty, but of ninety years, the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, of Chester.

THE Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association reminds us of the opportunity afforded by "Association Sunday" for generous support not only from the congregations throughout the country, where collections will be held, but from other friends, out of reach of the churches, on that particular Sunday, who may send their donations direct to Essex Hall. There never was a time when the work of the Association in the furtherance of liberal religious thought and life was more needed, both at home and abroad, or (we think we may say) was more vigorously and effectively carried on. But the extent of the work must always depend on the maintenance of a sufficient income.

AMONG the recipients of honours last week on the King's birthday were two of our friends, who received knighthood. Sir William Henry Talbot, for many years town clerk of Manchester, and a prominent member of the old Strangeways church, has a name honoured in his sons as well as in his own person. Mr. Hugo Talbot, town clerk of Brighton, is known to Southern provincials, while his brother, Mr. Edward Talbot, as joint-secretary of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, has a wide repute in the North. Sir Arthur Worthington Biggs is chairman of the committee of our Wandsworth church, and one of his sons, too, Mr. A. H. Biggs, is known far and wide for benevolent activity in the Sunday-school and mission field. Sir Arthur, who comes of a stock long associated with Liberalism, is vice-chairman of the political committee of the National Liberal Club.

COURTLY functions and discussions on other matters have interfered with the Education debate in the House of Lords this week, and a great number of amendments are still to be considered. The most important of the subjects recently dealt with is that of the position of teachers in regard to religious instruction. On the one hand it is urged, by the Bishops and their friends, that to engage a man to teach without ascertaining that he is competent would be futile. On the other hand it is maintained that no teacher competent to give ordinary instruction should suffer disabilities through his declining to give theological instruction. Obviously, there is most probability of refusal in cases where definitely denominational teaching is to be offered; and, while some difficulty must still exist, even in regard to Cowper-Temple teaching, the worst contingencies can be best escaped by leaving distinct formularies out of the school curriculum. This, however, is precisely what the clerical party decline to contemplate. The most important event of the week, in this connection, has been Mr. Birrell's declaration that the Peers' Bill, as he calls it, cannot possibly be accepted. We refer to this speech on another page.

THE awkward position of a "National Church" that cannot trust the representatives of the nation was illustrated this week. At a meeting of Convocation on Tuesday, the Archbishop of Canterbury asked for and obtained a joint committee to advise him as to the procedure he should adopt in connection with the "Ritual" difficulty. It may be remembered that the recent Royal Commission, in making its Report, recommended the King to issue "Letters of Business" authorising Convocation to consider the conclusions of the Report. The Archbishop believes that "lawlessness" is not so rife in the Church as would seem from the Report, but, nevertheless, some action seems to be necessary. The Ornaments Rubric is appealed to on both sides, and a statement is clearly desirable of "not what leaders of the Church said in 1662, but what we think and mean in 1906." By all means; but nothing can be law in this land without the sanction of Parliament, and nobody wants to ask that body to discuss the propriety of vestments and ceremonies and censings and so forth—least of all does Parliament want to be asked. The subject is adjourned till February, and one is curious to see how the knot will be untied, or cut.

DR. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., is to lecture on Monday evening on "Shakespeare's Mother," at the new Acton Unitarian Church, Creffield-road (near the Haberdashers' School for Girls). The lecture is at 8.15. Another Monday lecture (on December 17) is to be given at the same place by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on "The Social Problem and the Churches."

IN the November number of the Christian Freeman Mr. A. W. Blundell, of Liverpool, completes his series of interesting lessons on Martin Luther, which began in the previous number. In preparing these notes Mr. Blundell acknowledges his special indebtedness to the works of Dr. Charles Beard. To earlier numbers of the Freeman he contributed similar notes on Wiclif, Knox, Calvin, and Servetus. Such lessons on great lives and the history of religion are of the greatest value.

THE recently published annual report of the Local Government Board contains many matters of interest, and amongst them we may draw the attention of our readers to the new regulations with regard to the boarding-out of pauper children. For certain classes of children this has been recognised as the best possible form of support. There have been several obstacles to so full an adoption of the system as was desirable. One of these lay in the difficulty of securing sufficient local committees, with women who were able and willing to devote time to the necessary supervision. Miss Mason, the chief inspector of boarded-out children, has addressed numerous meetings this past year, and, as a result, has got several new committees started. But there is still room in this connection for very useful, if unexciting, public service. Two difficulties which have arisen from official regulations have now been relaxed. Hitherto the guardians had been prevented from paying more than 4s. a week for each child, and this did not pay the foster parents. The limit has now been raised to 5s. Then, further, under the old regulation the local committee had to pay out money to the foster parents before they received it. To some committees this proved a difficulty, and the regulation, which was unnecessary, has now been rescinded.

In the same report there is a description (by Mr. Herve, the Inspector for Norfolk and Suffolk) of the recently completed scheme by the Norwich Guardians of Cottage Homes for their children. There are still too many children in workhouses in some parts of the country, but the process of withdrawing them from so unsuitable an environment continues. Take this Norwich plan as an instance. They have different types of Homes, ranging from those capable of containing 40 boys (or girls) down to the cottage which accommodates a family group of 10 children. In connection with these there is a Receiving and Probationary Home, and here it is intended that the children shall be brought in the first instance, thus avoiding even the most temporary contact with the workhouse.

THE WELSH UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN LONDON (1895-1900).

SIR,—At the last half-yearly meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the Rev. Ephraim Turland, referring to the need of a Welsh Unitarian Church in London, spoke of “the last Welsh movement” as having been “carried on somewhat expensively,” or words to that effect. Either Mr. Turland has been deliberately misinformed, or else he is labouring under some delusion. When the full history of the Welsh Unitarian movement in London (1895-1900) comes to be written, as possibly it will be some day, I venture to think that it will make a readable and interesting chapter in the annals of London Unitarianism, and will probably serve as an eye-opener even to Unitarians themselves. In the meantime, perhaps, you will kindly allow me space to put a few facts before your readers, so as to remove any misapprehension to which Mr. Turland’s remarks may have given rise.

In June, 1894, a letter in reference to my work among the Welsh community in London appeared in the INQUIRER, of which a copy was forwarded to me, presumably by the writer. Before that I knew practically nothing of Unitarianism as a denomination, and had never heard of the existence of such a paper as the INQUIRER. Early in the following year, entirely alone, I began to organise a movement on the lines suggested in the In-QUIRER letter: It was not called Unitarian, and I had not the remotest intention of calling it by that name. It was not long, however, before I realised what it all meant; many preachers in the Welsh chapels thundered against my audacity; declaring that it was nothing but a Unitarian movement in disguise, and was intended simply to poison the minds of young Welshmen with infidelity and atheism, and so on. The prejudice that was stirred against me and my little movement was incredibly bitter. Had I known before what a thorough Unitarian I was, and had been for years, perhaps my difficulties would not have been so great. After a long and persistent effort through circulars, paragraphs in the newspapers, and in other ways, I managed at last to get a few people together—they were practically all Unitarians from South Wales. We met on a Sunday afternoon at 63, City-road, by the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Carlier. Subsequently for a time the meetings were held alternately at my house in Finsbury Park. Six months later we secured a suitable room in Wellington Hall, Islington, where meetings were held regularly every Sunday evening for six months. Then, through the kindness of Miss Emily Sharpe, we met at No. 5, Farnival-street, Holborn, where the services were held for about two years. For the room in Islington we paid five shillings a Sunday, which the collection usually covered. Every penny of the expense incurred in the first stages of the organisation came out of my own pocket, and at least for two years I conducted the services almost entirely myself. Gradually however, I gathered around me a most helpful lot of intelligent and earnest young men, so that before the end of three years the movement had connected with it at least six young men who used to take an occasional service—two schoolmasters, two medicos, one draper’s assistant, and one printer’s reader. They did not all preach their own sermons, it is true, but each one did his best, and a spirit of harmony and mutual helpfulness always pervaded our services. Nor do I think the record a bad one. After three years the services were held in the Council Room at Essex Hall, for which we paid ten shillings or ten and sixpence a Sunday. Here the congregation averaged about thirty-five.

It was not until the movement was two years old that we applied for assistance to any body outside our own circle, and then we had a grant of £5, either from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association or from the London District Unitarian Society, I forget which. Then, during the last two years of the movement’s existence one or two grants of a similar amount were again received. I do not know how much, as I had then little to do with the financial arrangements. If anyone imagines that I am writing this in glorification of myself, as it is but humanly natural for some people to do, my answer is that Mr. Turland’s observations are practically a challenge to me, and as I initiated the movement absolutely of my own accord, I consider that I am under an obligation to none but the few friends who assisted me in the later stages of the work, therefore crave for no glory and want nobody’s thanks. On the other hand, I consider that it is due to myself to remove any idea of extravagance which Mr. Turland’s words are calculated to produce in the minds of those who heard them. If there was any extravagance at all in carrying on the work of the Welsh Unitarian movement it was not until the fourth or fifth year of history, when some of the responsible friends began to develop symptoms of what appeared to me an unhealthy ambition to secure the expensive service of ministerial students from Oxford, rather than make the best of the less elaborate though probably equally effective preaching of practical laymen. Hence the appearance of signs of decline!

If the movement of which I speak had received the encouragement and support it deserved, I have no hesitation in saying that there would have been a strong Welsh Unitarian church in London at the present moment. But since I began about five years ago to do a little lay preaching among our churches in various parts of the country, and to come in contact here and there with members of the ministerial fraternity, it has gradually dawned upon me that as the promoters and leaders of the movement were but “mere laymen,” we were regarded by ministers generally with a tinge of professional suspicion. I may be wrong in my conclusion; I hope I am. But I think the time has come when we lay workers should speak out plainly on these matters, and should not be afraid to describe things denominational just as we find them. I must add, however, that throughout my connection with the Welsh movement I had every possible encouragement and personal sympathy from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (then editor of the INQUIRER), the late Rev. Robert Spears (as editor of the Christian Life), the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones (Liverpool), Ceredig Jones (Bradford), Hathren Davies, William James, and especially R. J. Jones, Aberdare. With these and perhaps one or two other exceptions, we were looked upon by the ministerial fraternity generally with something worse than cold indifference.

62, Leigh-road, Westcliff-on-Sea, Nov. 13.

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding tells us this week of the gift of a third Van, to be devoted to the Mission in the London district. We are glad to hear also of a further gift of £150 from Mrs. Bayle Bernard, who gave the first Unitarian Van.

FRIENDS in London will remember the performance of “His Excellency the Governor” at the King’s Hall, King-street, Covent Garden, on Wednesday evening, and its good object of helping on the Boston Conference Fund of 1907.

WORKERS’ AID SOCIETY.—The secretary reminds the members that their contributions should be sent to her by the end of this month or early in December. The society is for the purpose of sending useful garments to the Nursing Home at Winifred House, or to some of the London missions in poor districts. Any information will be given with pleasure by the Hon. Sec. Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth.

LITERATURE.

THE TEACHING OF THE APOSTLES.*

MORE than thirty years ago Bishop Bryennius discovered in a monastic library in Constantinople, a manuscript containing a short treatise or Manual entitled, "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles." Some years after the discovery he published an edition of the Manual, and it has since been edited by many scholars in Germany, France, and England. Several of the English editions of the text have been accompanied by translations; but the English layman, who does not read Greek, hesitates to purchase an edition of a book in that language, even if he is provided at the same time with a translation. In the summer session of University Extension Lectures in Oxford, in 1905, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History in Manchester College, gave two lectures on this extremely interesting and important manual; and now, at the request of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, he has put his lectures into the form of Introduction and Notes to an English Translation, and the Association has brought the little book out at a price that places it within everyone's reach.

Though lost for so many years, and only brought to light again so recently, there can be no doubt that this little manual was widely known and used in the early Church. In some ways it was superseded by the later, so called, "Apostolic Canons," which date from the third or fourth century, and in which a very considerable part of the "Teaching of the Apostles" is embedded. As Christian doctrine developed, the very simple ethics and theology of the "Teaching" was found insufficient, and the little book dropped out of use. Most persons would find it entirely inadequate to the needs of their religious life at the present day, and it cannot be said to contain even the elements of the vast schemes of theology of the Eastern, Western, or Protestant Churches. But there is a directness about it, and a primitive simplicity that carries us back to a vigorous, out-spoken movement, such as we find in the Gospels and the Book of Acts.

There can be no doubt that the traditional form of "The Teaching of the Apostles," if not the earliest written form, is anterior to our Book of Acts, and even to the Gospels as we now have them. It is referred to in Acts ii. 42:—"They were steadfast in the teaching of the apostles and in the fellowship, in the breaking of bread and in the prayers."

The indications of a later date all have the appearance of additions to the original work. There are clear signs of growth within the book itself, and Dr. Odgers carefully analyses it, and points out the additions to the first and simplest form. This growth was inevitable in works handed down first for some time by tradition, and then again for centuries by transcription. The oral teaching would certainly grow as all oral teaching does; and even after it was committed to writing, marginal notes would creep into the text, and additions would be made by intelligent scribes. Simple and direct as the teaching is, there is in the form which the text finally reached a certain modification of what one may call some of the more wholesale and impracticable Christian maxims. In place, for example, of exhortations to a universal love of all mankind alike (which can only be possible if we eliminate all personal feeling, and leave only a general desire of the universal welfare) we find, "Thou shalt hate no man, but some thou shalt reprove, for some thou shalt pray, and some thou shalt love more than thine own life."

The second part of the Manual, which Mr. Odgers calls "The Church Directory," gives short instructions for Baptisms, Fasting and Prayer, the Eucharist (which is a thanksgiving for life as revealed to us through Jesus, not for the death or sacrifice of Jesus—a communion of all the members of the Church with one another, not a communion of the individual with Christ), thanksgiving after the Eucharist, ordinances concerning itinerant preachers, public worship, the choice of Bishops and Deacons, &c.

For the interesting directions concerning these things we must refer our readers to the book itself. The modest sum of one shilling and three halfpence will cover the cost of the book and postage.

F. H. J.

JEWISH LITERATURE.*

THIS little book is a sign of the times; for it shows that modern Judaism is coming out of its seclusion and claiming its place in the open field of the world's thought and life. The Jewish Encyclopædia, recently completed, was an elaborate exposition of all that Judaism has done during its long history; but the great size of that work must prevent it from being more than a book of reference, chiefly for experts. It could never be popular. Mr. Abrahams, one of the editors of the "Jewish Quarterly Review," has ventured on the experiment of a popular hand-book of Jewish literature, intended not for the scholar but for the general reader. Light to hold, easy to read, small in cost, and very well written, his book has all the advantages that are desired in a popular book, except one, and that is a subject likely to attract. The literature dealt with is that of the Judaism since the fall of the Temple in A.D. 70, down to the time of Moses Mendelssohn. Thus all the Bible, both Old and New Testaments, is excluded. Very wisely, for several reasons. But the literature that is dealt with is practically unknown to the general reader; and usually, it neither has any interest for him, nor awakens any desire to learn about it. Amongst Christians it is not likely that Mr. Abrahams will at first find many readers. None the less, it is all to the good that the attempt should be made to awaken such an interest and desire. And it could hardly be made with more skill than is done in this little book. None but a Jew could do it at all; and Mr. Abrahams knows his way about the subject, although he might disclaim the rank of an original authority. He has given a thoroughly good outline, a bird's-eye view of the territory to be explored, which will be of great use to those who set out for the first time to explore it; and no less to those who merely wish to see what that unknown territory is like, and what it produces. The preface holds out the welcome promise of a more elaborate treatment of the same subject in a larger work that is in preparation. It is really wonderful how much Mr. Abrahams has managed to pack into the small compass of the present work. It is not merely a catalogue of names and dates, but contains some amount of critical appreciation of the several writers and their works. It is intended for English readers, and the references given to larger works are only to such as exist in an English form.

* A Short History of Jewish Literature. I. Abrahams. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

It would serve no useful purpose to give a general sketch of the contents of the book. I have indicated its object; and, with a hearty admiration for its merits, I wish it all success in its attempt to popularise the great literature of the Jews.

R. T. HERFORD.

ROBERT OWEN.

IF justification be needed for an excellent book, Mr. Podmore can find it in two facts. He has been able to make use of a large collection of Owen's letters which had been previously unknown; and which had, indeed, lain hid in a lumber-room for more than a generation, until, thanks to Owen's old friend, the late G. J. Holyoake, they were presented recently to the Co-operative Union at Manchester. These letters, to judge from Mr. Podmore's use of them, throw fresh and valuable light on the character of Owen. This biography must be considered timely on a second ground. It is now more than twenty years since the life by Lloyd Jones was written. During that period thought has undergone great changes, and the newer doctrines of society are well represented by the author of this book. The new biography is, in fact, more than a biography, it is a critical estimate by a twentieth century Fabian of one of the forerunners of socialism in the great era of individualism. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Podmore are men of different and complementary temperaments; but they both represent the social milieu in which they have worked. One most important part of the history of great men is to be found in the impression they make on successive generations. The two lives of Owen illustrate the mode of his appeal at different epochs.

The present "Life" is full and instructive, and contains, in addition to the chapters which are strictly biographical, an epitome of the social history for the period of Owen's life, from 1771 to 1858. The story of his early days is told largely in his own words, and enables us to follow his fortunes from the time when, as a boy of ten, he took the night coach from Shrewsbury to London, and shortly after reached Mr. McGuffog's drapery establishment at Stamford. We must not follow the boy through these years, which were, as were all the years of life, marked by industry and high moral quality. The readings in Burleigh Park at 4 o'clock in summer mornings laid the foundation of his large if miscellaneous knowledge, but we shall not halt till we reach Scotland, where, in "January, 1800, Robert Owen entered upon his kingdom." The mills of New Lanark became for many years famous throughout the country, and in the ears even of foreign potentates. The story has been often told, but is always worth telling again. Owen had faith and humanity. In spite of these qualities, or by virtue of them, he built up an immense business and made a large fortune. But his theories were not shared by his partners. "Perish the cotton trade" rather than it "shall be upheld by the sacrifice of everything valuable in life." With these views it is not strange that the partnership was dissolved. It throws some light on Owen's character that his next partners were men so dissimilar as William Allen and Jeremy Bentham. The mills at New Lanark were not only cotton mills, they were schools for the formation of character. The record of the infant schools is well told, and Owen's indebtedness to Lancaster and others abundantly emphasised. The dancing and music and moral geography may all be followed in these pages, and especially in the most illustrative and instructive illustrations. In connection with the cotton mills we notice one of the most ingenious of Mr. Podmore's theories. Owen was regarded by his contemporaries as a good man of business, and until the present has been cited as a great captain of industry. This view is now contested. Owen's fortune was "accident of the time . . . when capital had an extraordinary monopoly value." Certainly, in later years, his schemes for social reconstruction did always not show him as a "good business man," and the contrast between the supposed practical genius of New Lanark, and the lack of capacity which marked New Harmony, has always been a difficult problem. Mr. Podmore cuts the knot by denying the practical genius. This is but one of the shrewd explanations for which we have to thank the author.

A brief mention must suffice of the chapters in which the communistic experiments at New Harmony, Orbiston, and Queenwood are chronicled. They all failed, and the causes of the failure, which are not recondite, are unsparingly analysed. The one clear light which irradiates the record is the character of Owen himself, his high moral purpose, his unrestricted sacrifice and devotion. These qualities explain the love and veneration with which he was so generally esteemed by the men with whom he came in contact, and Mr. Podmore is not stinted in his appreciation. Sympathy with the man goes with a rather narrow criticism of his schemes. This is one of the points where I cannot entirely agree with the author. The schemes did fail, and it is well to have the causes exposed. But the tremendously significant fact is that the experiments were made at all. They witnessed to the rising of a new consciousness in the hearts of men, and Owen is entitled to our admiration for perceiving this. Men were feeling after a new and larger social intercourse, some more satisfying intercourse, and one which should lift them above the grinding individualism which then did duty for political economy and religion. Nor is it enough to say that the experiments failed. Mr. Podmore's record is sufficient to show that before they failed they proved to be a promised land of fraternity to many individuals. I think that while their value as experiments is justly estimated their value as ideas needs to be more clearly marked.

Owen's ambition, however, was not exhausted in becoming a rich cotton master, or a founder of communities, or a reformer of the currency, or in finding a solution for unemployment, or in any particular activity. He would comprehend the whole range of life and destiny by establishing a New Moral World, based on the proposition that man's character is formed for him, not by him. The proposition is enforced by woodcuts in Owen's "Essays on the Formation of Human Character," two of which are reproduced (p. 112). They leave us doubtful whether the drunken turmoils of one picture are not preferable to the smug comfort of the other. These pictures are in themselves an ample refutation of Owen's theory as Owen held it. Mr. Podmore supplements his woodcuts by valuable critical work, and especially serves the reader by pointing out, what Owen did not sufficiently recognise, viz., that heredity is certainly as important as education. This introduces us to the general judgment of Owen which these volumes reflect. He was (perhaps without knowing it) a disciple of Rousseau, and as such he took superficial views of society. He ignored the stubbornness of human nature.

Enough has been said to indicate that Mr. Podmore's attitude is severely judicial, and this is so unlike the tone of biography to which we are accustomed as to be a little disconcerting. It is a natural weakness to wish the author to take one side or the other. For the most part Mr. Podmore declines to take a side, and accordingly the writing, while never dull, is somewhat hard. One chapter (xxi.), "The Holy War," which relates the battle waged by the Church against the Owenite propaganda, stands out as by far the most piquant in the book, and this is so partly because the writer allows himself to be a trifle impatient of the things he disapproves; he is frankly with us in our dislike of Mr. Brindley and the Bishop of Exeter.

We pass by the story of Owen's later days, of the old man's failing powers, of his spiritualistic seances, his conversation with the (deceased) Duke of Kent; and follow him as he returns at the last, dauntless as ever, to the little Welsh town which he had not seen for more than seventy years, and where at length he passed from the home of his childhood to the silent land. Whatever the place which is ultimately to be accorded to him in history, whether or not he "rose to the highest," two thoughts abide with us as we lay down these volumes. Owen exercised in a striking degree the rare faculty of inspiring men. He animated his followers to the quest of the communal life with "something of the religious recklessness" and "what is the worth of an ideal which does not drive men at least to attempt the impossible." Owen's "impossible" has not become possible for us, but it has made things possible which would still have remained beyond our reach but for the hopes of this man who was never forlorn. Beyond all, the man stands before us in these pages, and that, I suppose, is the test of a biography. He was not flawless; obstinacy, single vision, lack of humility are noted as shadows in the portrait. But there was also in him a "spirit of unwearied loving kindness, and the strong simplicity which was able to keep its regard fixed on the highest issues of life and character."

A word of praise must be added for the illustrations which so largely increase our enjoyment of the work. Besides the numerous portraits of Owen, there are such pictures as "Old Women and the Bugaboo," or "Protestantism versus Socialism," which present a whole aspect of social history in the mid nineteenth century.

NAPOLÉON.*

THIS volume of the Cambridge history is devoted to the momentous years 1799 to 1815. In some respects it surpasses the volumes issued previously in the minute detail of its treatment, but the critical issues involved in this short and exciting period for the whole of the political history of Modern Europe make this necessary. The material is all grouped round the name of the Colossus who for a few years held Europe in the hollow of his hand, and gave his name to one of the chief eras of transition. If readers expect to find in this collection of elaborate essays by specialists anything in the nature of a continuous biography of Napoleon they will be disappointed. For that they must turn to the brilliant life by Dr. J. Holland Rose. It may be viewed rather as an exhaustive commentary to be kept at hand by students who wish to study special aspects of the political situation, of law or finance in detail. Perhaps it is necessary still to warn the general reader against the error of regarding Napoleon exclusively as the military scourge of the nations, who left only the red ruin of war in his train. He combined with his insatiable lust of conquest the gifts of a great constructive statesman, and his name may be coupled with that of Theodosius for the grandeur of conception which inspired his legal reforms. It is not too much to say that the later movement for the unification of Italy was based largely upon the foundations which he had laid. For this aspect of Napoleon's activity the chapter in the present volume on "The Codes," by Mr. H. A. L. Fisher should be studied, and also the section on "The French Dependencies," by the same writer. "The French rule," says Mr. Fisher, "gave a more serious and practical bent to the Italian intellect. Special schools were instituted for music, agriculture, engineering. Lycées in the French style were planned in every department; at Milan, Bologna, and Venice academies of art were erected which were to elect a commission dell' ornato, charged with the duty of embellishing cities; military education became quite as serious, and far more scientific than it had been elsewhere, even in Prussia; and the study of military history experienced a renaissance. The effect of the army upon the country was profound and far-reaching. It helped to obliterate provincial and social distinctions; it provided a career for talent; it roused the rich from their lethargy, and formed an admirable school for patriotism; it restored to the Italians their self-respect."

In view of the present ecclesiastical situation in France the chapter on the Concordats by Mr. L. G. Wickham-Legg is of special interest. In his negotiations with the papacy in order to subordinate the deeply seated Catholicism of the people and the dominance of the clergy to his aims, Napoleon lavished all the arts of his astute diplomacy. It may be doubted, however, whether he was not in many respects outwitted. The Concordat, which was published on April 18, 1802, of immense practical importance as it was at the moment for the stability of his own position, hardly contained the securities for a satisfactory national settlement which he supposed. "Experience was to show," as Mr. Wickham-Legg remarks, "that in some ways its effect was the reverse of what Bonaparte intended. He had hoped that the clergy would revive its old loyalty to the Government, and resist all encroachments of the papal power. He did not see that, by putting the parish priests absolutely into the hands of the bishops he gave the latter an army which might some day be used against him; and that, by depriving the bishops of their lands, he deprived them, now that they had lost their self-taxing powers, of the moderating influence they had been able to exercise over the Government of the ancien régime, and reduced them, in case of conflict with the civil power, to rely for support on their ancient rival, the Pope. The decay of Gallicanism and the rise of Ultramontanism in France during the nineteenth century is to be attributed in no small degree to the Revolution and to the Concordat of 1801." The bearing of these observations upon the present quarrel between Church and State in France is obvious. It is simply one illustration of the intimate relation between many of the living problems of European politics and the upheaval and resettlement, in which Napoleon was the dominant personal force.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's Contemporary M. Paul Sabatier follows up his July article with another on "The Religious Movement in France," in which he notes the effect of the Pope's uncompromising condemnation of the law of separation, in spite of the very different attitude of the majority of his French bishops, who had dared to be patriots as well as churchmen. For the moment the bishops have submitted to Papal authority, but the best men among French Catholics, and especially the cultured laity, feel that the Pope and his advisers have made a very grave mistake. They feel, says M. Sabatier, that the Church, as at present governed, is deserting them, but they do not mean to desert the true Church, and are upheld by their belief in a better future to which it must attain. M. Sabatier quotes from a striking appeal of a group of French Catholics to the Pope, which was published in the Temps of September 2. Quoting the Pope's reproach against his bishops—"They have acted as Frenchmen"—as having been, in fact, their highest eulogy, and affirming that the real France was in complete accord with them, the appellants ask the Pope to remember, while there is yet time, the great pity felt at this time for France by the bishops and the best of the faithful, "who understand that the concerns of Catholicism are with us bound up with the destinies of our great country and of a civilisation which will never deny the principles of the French Revolution, but which derives its origin from a more distant and a loftier source, from the Gospel and from the very heart of Christ." Whatever the immediate future may bring, this document, says M. Sabatier, will remain as a landmark in history for those who want to understand "what at the commencement of the twentieth century were the aspirations of the younger clergy of France." This article is followed by one on "Letters of Business," in which Canon Hensley Henson deals very faithfully with Convocation, and gives a most interesting account of its history and present position. He shows how very slight is the representative character of Convocation, and views "with grave misgivings any attempt on its part to meddle with the Canons and the Prayer Book, because its efforts as at present constituted would only be in a Romeward direction, which is alien to the character of the English people, and it has no real public opinion at its back, and so could only injure the real interests of the Church. "Our strength as a Church," says Canon Henson, "is to sit still. There are forces at work which, if but they be given time enough, will silently but surely correct the obscurantist tendencies which at the moment are dominant in the hierarchy." The article by Dr. Münsterberg on "Poor Relief in Berlin" should be also noted. The writer, who is President of the Berlin Poor-Law Board, corrects some mistakes in the otherwise admirable article by Miss Edith Sellars in the Contemporary of last December, and shows how ample and considerate is the provision made for the aged poor in his city.

Convocation and its present renewed activity is the subject of two articles in the Nineteenth Century and After. Mr. Herbert Paul, M.P., in the second of these, makes very light of its authority, and declares the duty of lay Churchmen at the present moment to be, through Parliament, and not through Convocation, to maintain the Protestant character of the Church of England. "The Oxford Movement," he concludes, "has spent itself, and the Bishops are walking in a dream." Professor G. Henslow has a brief article on "The True Darwinism," and Mr. Slade Butler writes again on "The Greek Mysteries and the Gospels."

The Independent Review concludes its notes on current events with one on the Church Congress, "remarkable for the large amount of attention given to matters social and political, and especially for the striking sermon by the Bishop of Birmingham on 'The Church and Wealth,' " in which he pleaded that the Church must cease to be of the rich rather than of the poor, and return to a condition of things nearer to the intention of Christ. Such opinions, says the Independent, have been often expressed by Churchmen, "but they were made remarkable by the eager assent with which they were received, the emphasis and evident deliberation with which they were uttered, the wise and practical recommendations which accompanied them, and perhaps, above all, the position of Dr. Gore himself, a bishop who refuses to keep a carriage or live in a palace." In this number Mr. G. H. Wells writes on "Modern Socialism and the Family," and Dr. A. R. Wallace on "The Native Problem in South Africa and Elsewhere."

In the Review of Reviews there is an interview with General Miles on "The Negro Problem." Among the pictures one sees Selby Abbey both before and after the fire.

The Coming Day, the Rev. J. Page Hopps's monthly, is to be published after December next by Mr. Fifield, 44, Fleetstreet, E.C. The November number contains the sermon preached by Mr. Hopps at Cambridge on October 13, and also an unspoken sermon by "A Layman" on "A Deep Church," of which this is the conclusion:—

"It is well to begin with fear, lest we should fail; so the nerve grows hardened for battle. 'Fear makes brave men,' the Duke of Wellington said, in his curt, incisive fashion. The fear which our deep church will seek to cast out arises merely from want of practise. Charity knows no fear, and is a shield to faith, without which the votary is a coward, and thinks it is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the living God! The man is a hound who is always in a state of tremor about his selfish salvation. He thinks of God as an infinite hangman, who would be certain to execute justice on His creatures (and why did He make them?) but for certain interposition. With these dreams of barbarous centuries and ignorant priests who never studied philosophy, the deep church will not concern itself. The old ruin will fall, without the help of human hands. Affirmationists in the Temple of the Highest, constructive in their efforts, may listen with joy and thanksgiving to a sweet and solemn anthem. It peals through the mighty fane with words of peace and good-will towards men. Stand we in reverence, looking up—never down where the corpses lie and where all is shattered—Look up to God and sing!"

THE congregation of the North Shore Unitarian Free Church, under the leadership of the Rev. Robert McGee, are making an earnest effort to clear their church of the last £300 of debt, which remains a discouraging burden on the progress of their work. With the help of generous friends they have recently cleared off £500, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has promised the last £20 of the remainder. May the Association very soon be called upon to pay!

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XLVIII.

PUDENS, a young pastor whom I sometimes meet, is haunted by the word "hireling." "The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling." He sees here a condemnation of himself. The hireling and the faithful pastor are opposed. In short, he is seriously doubtful whether he ought to be a paid minister.

"Freely ye have received, freely give." That seems to him to say all that need be said. In vain I quote apostolic sanction, and remind him that the feeder of the flock may eat of the milk of the flock. He is not convinced. Maintenance, he contends, is one thing, and remuneration another. To this I reply that, under the law of wages, remuneration is maintenance in more convenient form; that he who hires is as much in a state of dependence and indebtedness as he who is hired, and that this was in the apostle's mind when he asked, "Is it a great matter if we shall reap your carnal things?" He meets this by saying that in secular life there are services which cannot be measured in terms of money—the very thought of equivalent is an offence—much more ought ministrations in spiritual things to be regarded as beyond the range of money-valuation; devotion, to be devotion, must be gratuitous. And there our argument stands.

The difficulty would hardly, I think, arise, if the word "mercenary" were allowed to mean what it signifies, and no more. Like many another once colourless term it has become tinged with distrust of human motive. To serve for money is not necessarily to serve for money's sake. Ruskin leans to the ill construction when he says that the profession of the preacher is a mercenary profession. He says the same thing, it is true, of the professions of the judge, and of the soldier, and hopes that some day the three professions, as now ordered, will be entirely abolished. But is it not a fact of experience that no arrangement between two parties is so generally satisfactory as a mercenary arrangement? A fixed stipulation quickens and sustains the sense of obligation on each side. It defines duties and claims, whilst it also limits them. Confess it or not, as we like, it makes us more scrupulous, more conscientious. A precarious, indefinite position leads to petty complications, and sometimes to unworthy expedients, and a so-called labour of love is often the disguise of a proud delicacy which is not humble enough to be bound by conditions.

Nevertheless, I will not say that Pudens is altogether wrong. The Quakers, we know, draw the same distinction between maintenance and remuneration: They who preach the gospel may "live of the gospel," but to make a bargain beforehand, to be sure of so much a year, is with them to "hinder the gospel." It is a nice distinction. It is one of Barclay's Propositions in his Apology that ministry must be without hire, must not be a trade to get money by, that it is "lawful to receive only such Temporals (to wit, what may be needful for meat and clothing) as are given them freely and cordially by those to whom they have communicated Spirituals." The flaw in the reasoning seems to be that in the pastoral charges of the Gospels the words "food" (τροφή) and "pay" (μισθός) are both used, and the former would certainly not supply all the wants of an itinerant ministry. It is easy to see what has been the effect in the past of a system of endowments and emoluments; it is not so easy to say what would be the effect in the future of unsystematic doles and pittance: Some of the worst ecclesiastical abuses would certainly have been avoided if Christian ministry had been made less lucrative; too many things have been done, and not in Crete alone, "for filthy lucre's sake." But, with the same experience of the past to guide us, we may say that ministerial mendicancy has its drawbacks also: It is not easily combined with efficiency. If patronage and preferment, and the prizes of high office, have been corrupting influences, they have also been attractions, without which much distinguished and fruitful service would never have been secured. The happy mean would possibly be the adoption of a graduated scale of approved payment, as in other fields of official career.

"Freely ye have received." It is an old objection that training for the ministry is not now freely received: It involves expensive preparation and a long period of unremunerative waiting. Common prudence demands, and common sense agrees, that the outlay should be taken into account and made good by those who expect it, and profit by it:

My own misgivings are deeper, I fear, than those which trouble Pudens. I sometimes wonder whether paid ministries may not be the chief bar to that fusion of divided churches which we all desire. Specialised and salaried functions of any kind produce a tenacious and pugnacious habit of mind. A professional spirit, once excited, magnifies and elaborates everything that is professionally distinctive: The lay mind is less combative, and religious bodies would probably gravitate into harmony, though not perhaps into unity, if ministers of religion did not make the lines of separation needlessly sharp, and offensively clear: I must ask Pudens whether we cannot have a round-table conference on the subject.

IN MEMORIAM.

Be joy still ours! For have we not together

In union sweet Life's dusty pathway trod?

Our married souls no dreadful doom can sever:

Love still is ours—that greatest gift of God!

Be joy still thine! For, in thy home supernal—

Where joy is crowned by joy, and new delights

And wonders new unfold—is bliss eternal; For ever Love abides in those clear heights.

Be joy still mine! For, answering to my yearning,

With magic brush doth memory paint for me

Thy face benignant, still upon me turning Its look of Love, and Peace, and Purity.

ALICE ARMSTRONG LUCAS:

OBITUARY.

MRS. FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD.

It is with deep regret that we record the death on Sunday last at Streatham-grove of Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold. She had been ill for many months, but the end came somewhat suddenly. Mrs. Nettlefold was sister to the late Mr. John Warren, and a brother and sister survive her. When in good health she took an active interest in Unitarian work, and was always ready by her presence and her purse to help our churches and missions. She was bright and eager in her advocacy of any movement in which she was interested, and the Women's Liberal Association and other organisations greatly appreciated her services. Those who have heard her read or speak in public know that she possessed considerable dramatic power of expression. A delightful companion, a steadfast friend, a generous benefactor, there are many who will keep her life and good deeds in grateful and affectionate remembrance. Those near and dear to her will miss her sorely, for she prized her home-life above everything else. Two sons and three daughters mourn a mother's death. Her husband's name is known and honoured among all our churches and societies, and there will go out to him the sincere sympathy of a wide circle of friends.

SUGGESTIONS ON "RESTATEMENT."

I.—HISTORY AND RELIGION.

In a recent essay in restatement with the above title (June 2) it was held that religious beliefs should not be based upon historical events. "Absolute truth can hardly be thought of in connection with probable evidence." Now if all that is meant by this is (to quote further) that religion must be free to reject what is "historically unassured" we agree. But when "spiritual intuition" is set up against historical beliefs as the source of religious faith there is a difficult position. And here let us premise that the point is not, as the writer seems to think, that faith cannot vouch for the truth of historical statements. It certainly cannot: But it must be maintained that our religious belief is partly, even largely, constituted by the views we hold of history. It has been well said that religion is essentially a doctrine of the world. Even Dr. Percy Gardner, who makes so much of psychology, is in agreement with this. All ideas about God are really ideas about the nature of the world. And our ideas about the nature of the world must rest upon what we believe about its courses and fortunes—its history. It would make all the difference to our attitude in religion if, e.g., we found that the life of Jesus and the story of his disciples were the ingenious contrivance of some deft literary artist of the second century, and must be simply dropped out, as Edwin Johnson wanted to drop certain centuries. We can never get free from the necessity to build upon concrete facts. Every Absolutist philosopher no less than every Pragmatist persuades himself that he does so. Have we never heard of the "dialectical idyll" in which Hegel is said to have delineated the self-evolution of the Absolute on the shores of the Mediterranean? It is quite true that "Faith is a moral effort, and has nothing to do with the process by which conviction is formed." But this says nothing as to the objects and contents of faith. Faith in God must carry with it implications as to His government of the world. The attempt to get an object of faith in vacuo is useless. It is allied to the attempt to sever faith from reason and keep them in water-tight compartments. There is no secure and serene Olympia of faith where contingency has not to be reckoned with. Bishop Butler was right about "probability." If a man said that wherever he stood upon the earth it might give way under him, therefore he would never rest till he could stand on air, we should have a parallel to this distrust of historical religion. We must take the risk. Intuition and insight are of course the immediate form of our religious knowledge, but they are intuition of and insight into facts, histories, persons: Of course they are spiritual; but history is spiritual. Too often what men take for their intuitions are anæmic ghosts bred of isolation from the shocks and perils of actuality. No wonder the world is suspicious of them.

The logical outcome of non-historical religion is seen in the slippery slide into non-theistic ethicism: whose woe Mr. Chesterton has spoken. From this cul de sac of modern thinking we can be saved only by discovering the actual organic affiliations existing among men, by means of which their lives are ranged into an evolution that reveals God. For us, this means historic Christianity.

W. WHITAKER:

UNITY:

It is the hour, the hour of God,
And now is the time to be;
And all that travelled the endless road
Is touching the life in thee:

The waves of the universe meet
In the will of a human soul,
And the passions of ages beat
In reason that love makes whole.

The eyes of the stars are thine,
And thy very heart is theirs,
Hope far remote is near divine,
And darker with brighter shares:

Heaven is open to this earth,
The high and the low are kin;
The sun a brother is in birth,
With our homes and fires within:

The passing is making the ever,
The chance is a step of law,
And the fate that seems to sever
Obeys what the future saw:

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I JUST mentioned to you last week the new little book by Miss Frances E. Cooke, "The Children's Hour,"* and said I was sure you would like to have it. The first and last pieces are New Year's addresses which have not been published before, and there are two others I am not sure about, but the other twenty-two have all appeared in our Children's Column; and perhaps you will remember that there are six more of her "columns" reprinted in that other little book of "Addresses to Children for use in Home and School," which was published six years ago by the Sunday School Association.

I am reminding you of this, because Miss Cooke is an invalid now, and cannot write any more children's columns for us, and her sister has to take care of her. It will, I know, be a great pleasure to them both to feel that you children are glad to have these little books, with the others she has written for you, and to know that you are thinking gratefully and lovingly of her in her illness. Look at the last page of this "Children's Hour," and you will see from the list that there are twenty-one little books which Miss Cooke has written, all for you children, and all telling of the lives of noble men and women: There are the stories of such great Englishmen as Latimer and William Tyndale and Sir Thomas More, and of those brave reformers Cobden and Lloyd Garrison, and of our own religious teachers and heroes, Theophilus Lindsey, Channing and Parker; then there is the beautiful life of Dorothea Dix and of St. Francis of Assisi, and the poet Whittier; these and others, all helping us to feel how brave and true and beautiful our human life may be. One of the books is called "In Goodly Company," and another "Noble Workers," each of them containing a number of short biographical sketches; and a rather larger book is the history of England, in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Children's Study Series." As one thinks of all these books, and of how their inspiring story, so simply and beautifully told, has helped the children, and the elders too, in innumerable homes, to believe more in goodness and to be themselves more brave and true, one feels that it is a very rich harvest that she who wrote the books is reaping all the time from her years of patient and devoted work. And those who know her best know most surely, what all must feel who read her books, how beautiful and brave and unselfish a spirit has from the first inspired her work, worthy of that "Goodly Company."

Look at "The Children's Hour" and you will see that it is full of helpful things. In the chapter about Emerson's famous saying, "Hitch your wagon to a star," Miss Cooke tells about Michael Angelo, and in the last New Year's address, which is new to us, she speaks of him again. The address is on "Set thine house in order," and speaking about the religion men need in their daily lives Miss Cooke says:—

"One thing is certain, the more we try to do the right the more clearly do we hear the divine whisper in our souls. We all need a Gospel which shall teach us to find God in our daily work, which shall make our daily pleasures holy, and show that he serves God best who most does his duty in the world:

"It is said that of old the great artist Michael Angelo took his copies from the common persons in the streets and wrought them out on the walls and ceilings of the Vatican, changing a beggar into a giant, and an ordinary woman who bore a basket of flowers on her arm into an angel. And the beggar and the flower girl stand there now in their lustrous beauty, speaking to travellers who wander thither from every part of the world. So out of the common daily events we may paint on the walls of our lives the fairest figures. Surely it is a glorious thing for us that when, at the ending of the old year* we want to set our house in order we can turn our thoughts to Christ, whose birth we celebrate this week, and can see how far the spirit of our lives resembles his. We have to look at no great ideal out of sight of our own every day lives, but at one who lived among simple homely people, and who carried his holy influence to the workshop and the marriage feast, and to all the ordinary events of life.

* * *

"Not long ago I was in a foreign city where stood a great cathedral, and the narrow street, and crowded little houses pressed up closely round it, and the busy ways of men and the noises of the town went on whilst the cathedral stood almost unnoticed, except four times an hour, when the bells high up in the tower rang out some sweet old tune. Then the children listened in their play, and the busy men and women who thronged the narrow streets turned their thoughts to the beautiful temple in their midst."

"So the thought of Christ's holy example should constantly break in upon us to influence our daily thoughts and deeds: If this were so we should have no need of prophet's words or New Year's bells to rouse us to a better life, for 'our house would always be in order.'"

Those are almost the last words of this little book. They will help to remind you how much worth your while it will be to get it, and to tell your friends about it, too.

With this month's number of The World's Work and Play Mr. Henry Norman, M.P. completes the eighth volume of this popular magazine and four years of admirable work. With his retirement from the editorship the magazine is to become entirely non-political in character, but will retain all the other features of illustration and practical information which have made it so welcome a visitor.

Good Housekeeping reaches this month the seventh number of its first volume (40, Whitefriars-street, E.C. 6d. monthly), and continues to furnish good and useful advice as well as wholesome amusement for those who aspire to be good householders. MR. BIRRELL'S REPLY.

THE speech delivered by Mr. BIRRELL at Bristol on Tuesday has doubtless attracted the attention of many of our readers. It deserves the attention of all who are interested in his particular subject, the Education Bill, and of all who believe in the principle of self-government. One of the chief complaints against the line taken by the Opposition Peers in regard to the Bill is that it impairs the force of local authority. Mr. BIRRELL does not exaggerate the danger of pursuing such a line. Men of ability will not be attracted to public service of the local councils if their discretion is to be perpetually hampered by cast-iron legislation. The frequent introduction of "shall," instead of "may," into the Bill vitally affects its character. The cause of this kind of alteration is not far to seek; indeed, it has been candidly admitted during the debates in the House of Lords. It arises from a rooted distrust of the Democracy. Instances are quoted of action by the local authority, which, for one reason or another, is objectionable to certain parties. As a matter of fact, we believe, instances of real hardship are very few—certainly not sufficient to justify penalising all the great self-governing bodies with mandatory regulations which destroy initiative and kill the interest necessary to produce effective public service. Mr. BIRRELL does well to expose the mistake of pursuing such a policy.

But he could hardly have possessed a mere tincture of the true democratic spirit, if he had not raised his vigorous protest against the whole procedure involved in the constitution and practice of the Upper House. Consisting of men in whose appointment as legislators the nation has no voice, it continually thwarts the endeavours of the House of Commons whenever the majority in that House happens to be Liberal. No matter how great that majority may be, its will is subject to the kind of obstruction manifested in the debates of the House of Lords on the Education Bill. When we remember that one, and only one, section of the religious community is specially, and we may say strongly, if not formidably, represented in the Upper House, the anomaly becomes monstrous. The United Kingdom is not, and cannot be, a self-governing nation while the House of Lords remains where it is and what it is.

If grave constitutional issues are thus forced to the front, the fault is not theirs who have urged moderation on the Lords, lay and spiritual. In our medley of compromises we are a people little disposed to pursue the absolutely logical. Anomalies in theory are long tolerated among us, if substantial practical justice is secured. Mr. BIRRELL, we think, has reason on his side when he remonstrates that his Bill has not been met in the spirit in which it was offered. Even his opponents must admit that he gave ample evidence of a power to appreciate their case, and of a genuine desire to go as far as possible to conciliate them. Many of his friends believed, and still maintain, that he went too far in this direction. He wished to secure certain essential principles—full popular control of all schools maintained out of the public purse, freedom of all teachers from theological tests, and the provision of simple Bible teaching for the children generally, while affording opportunity in special cases for special types of doctrinal instruction. In regard to the first of these the Lords have seriously crippled the local authorities; in regard to the second they have insisted on amendments which, in "allowing" the ordinary teacher to give special doctrinal teaching, obviously "allow" the managers of schools to shut out all applicants but those of their own peculiar theological colour. As to the provision of "simple Bible teaching," Mr. BIRRELL speaks pathetically. As a practical man he sees clearly that to leave all religious teaching "to the churches," as we are often urged, is to trust to a very doubtful expedient. For his own part he would deeply regret what is called the "secular solution," although he acknowledges that many who supported him in this attitude in the House of Commons were less apprehensive as to that solution than he was. But all his conciliatory efforts have been fruitless; the Bill, as it will emerge from the Lords, will be a "Church" Bill, not a national one, and the "Government will have no use for such a Bill." The sole hope, a very faint one, that something good may survive the strife of parties over the measure, lies in the possible penitence of the Peers when reporting the Bill. Mr. BIRRELL's straightforward and manly statement may possibly affect them; if not, we can but anticipate a very serious struggle. If we understand the temper of the House of Commons and of the constituencies, such a struggle will inevitably result in the tearing up of some amiable compromises, and a considerably worse plight for those who wish to teach their private creeds at public expense.

FRENCH PROTESTANT UNION.

In the INQUIRER of August 25 Professor JEAN RÉVILLE wrote on the "Situation of the Churches in France," and referring to the prospects of the Protestant churches, told of the renewed refusal of the extreme orthodox party at their synod, held at Montpellier in June, to agree to any possible terms of union with the liberal wing. This led to a decided movement of protest on the part of the moderate orthodox men of the Centre, who from the first had pleaded for union. As a result the Consistory of Jarnac, holding that moderate position, took the initiative in summoning a representative assembly of all the churches anxious to find a basis for union. This Assembly was held at Jarnac, which is a little town on the Charente, about sixty miles south-east of La Rochelle, on October 24 to 26, and realised more than all the expectations of the friends of union and peace. According to the last report that we have seen more than a hundred churches were represented by some 130 delegates, and many more, prevented by distance from being present, were in hearty accord with what was done.

Much earnest work had been done in preparation for this meeting. A group of moderate orthodox clergy, who met at Rouen in July, issued a declaration very similar to that originally offered by the liberals as a basis for union, with an earnest plea for the sinking of differences for the sake of the common cause of French Protestantism, and for the success of the meeting at Jarnac; while a similar plea was made in September by the Provincial Synod at Livron (Drome). When the Assembly met at Jarnac the proposed declaration of principles, which should be the basis of union, was in the hands of all the members, and had already received full consideration. It was passed unanimously, without discussion, by the Assembly, as we shall presently relate, but there was full discussion of the preliminary resolutions and of the statutes of the proposed National Union of the Reformed Churches of France. We shall print at the end of this article the resolutions, the preamble, and the Declaration of Principles, for the translation of which we are indebted to the Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, of Torquay.

On the first day of the Assembly, M. WILFRED MONOD, a leader of the Moderates, presented on behalf of his Committee of Organisation an admirable report on the steps which had led up to that meeting, and the spirit of the proposals for union; and in the order of the succeeding business, the proposed Statutes for the National Union of the Churches were considered before the vote was taken on the Declaration of Principles.

The Statutes declared that the National Union, to be formed in accordance with the laws of July 1, 1901, and December 9, 1905, should be known as the Union of the Reformed Churches, the affairs of which would be managed by a general representative assembly.

"Adopting the declaration of the Apostle Paul: 'The letter killeth but the Spirit giveth life,' the Union desires to group together those who have for their aim, not a dogmatic uniformity, but the triumph of truth, holiness, and love." Such was the second statute, and the third provided that membership should be open not only to those religious societies which accepted the actual Declaration of Principles, but to those also which declared their own principles to be broadly the same as those of the Union.

When the Assembly came on the last morning to deal with the Declaration of Principles, there was at one point a moment's hesitation as to whether there ought not to be some further discussion of its terms, but this was swept away by an impassioned and persuasive speech of CHARLES WAGNER's, which ended amid a scene of profound and indescribable emotion. Several liberal ministers, when the motion for the adoption of the Declaration was made, had urged that it should be at once accepted, without discussion, since the churches which sent them there had already earnestly considered its terms, and it was on the basis of that Declaration that they had met; but M. GOUNELLE, a moderate minister, objected that it might have the appearance of undue haste if the vote were taken at once. M. BERTRAND enforced the plea of his fellow liberals, and then M. WAGNER rose and added the final convincing word. In his own person, he said, and in his own religious experience, he had long since united those forces which in Protestantism had been in conflict, excluding one another, and which that day they were anxious to unite. Nurtured in orthodoxy, he had passed through other experiences of the inward life, but always to find the same Gospel, and, under the most diverse forms, the same inspiration. So he recognised that men who were equally good Christians were in conflict simply because they did not understand one another. He found the true reconciliation as he let their thoughts permeate his own soul. In the spirit of him who said: "I am the Truth," there was a wonderful power to reduce the most various fractions to a common denominator. They had come together, disciples of the one Saviour, the Crucified, they had the same passion for the Eternal, the living and ever present

God, the same faith in Him. They had come to that Assembly from the East and the West, from opposite poles of thought, as into a furnace where their substance would be tested by the fire, and they would be brought to union. In that crucible, where they were united in love and sorrow, there would be seen to be but one bright metal left, the pure gold of Christian communion. When lovers came to the altar to be married they did not begin to discuss the articles of the Civil Code, and had no need of advocates. They said simply "Yes," and their souls went into the one word. That was enough. And so it was with them that day. It was a happy union they were to complete and seal. Let them have confidence. The Invisible was in their midst, more powerful than all who were against them, Himself to preside at that union, a guarantee of its sincerity and permanence. Let them hear CHRIST saying to them: "My children, I am here. Do not fear; only believe!"

That is a very imperfect report of M. WAGNER's speech, but even a verbatim report, we are assured, could by no means reproduce its profound effect upon the Assembly. Moderates and liberals alike were moved to tears. M. GOUNELLE cried out, "The discussion is at an end"; and M. WILFRED MONOD, the leader of the Moderates, threw himself upon WAGNER's neck. The President addressing WAGNER said: "The Spirit of God moved in your heart, and at the same time in the hearts of the others, clearing all hindrances away"; and he then read the Declaration, the whole Assembly standing, and it was unanimously adopted. M. SCHULZ offered prayer, and the members united in singing LUTHER's hymn: "A mighty fortress is our God."

So the Union was effected, and after a brief recess the business of organisation was completed. The final resolution was an expression of gratitude for the happy issue of the meeting, and at the same time of sorrow that one part of the family of the Reformed had been absent from that festival of reconciliation. It offered to the brethren who had not felt able to be present the assurance that every word spoken and every act of the Assembly had one constant aim—to hasten the union of all French Protestants on the common ground of evangelic faith. The President ended his closing address with an expression of confidence that after that morning's profound experience of the Divine presence in their midst, God would give them strength to meet all criticisms, even the most unjust, to which they would doubtless be subjected, and to overcome all by love and charity.

The Assembly of Jarnac has secured that there shall at least be not more than two divisions of the old Church of the Huguenots, the ultra-orthodox and the free and progressive. Its members are pledged to work for ultimate unity.

THE RESOLUTIONS AT JARNAC.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE FIRST SITTING, ON THE READING OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

THE Representatives of the Reformed Churches assembled at Jarnac, placing themselves outside of and above party divisions,

Having heard the explanations of the Committee of Initiative, appointed at Rouen to prepare the present Assembly;

Having taken cognizance of the address unanimously voted by the Synod of the United Reformed Churches at Livron;

Express the hope that nothing shall any longer prevent them from working together for the building up of a spiritual edifice, open to all the children of the Reformation in France;

Declare that they are in agreement as to the necessity of giving, as a foundation, to this edifice, a religious Declaration, a Discipline, and a Programme of evangelization;

Finally, at the moment of setting to work, they humble themselves before God for their errors and their faults. They offer thanks to Him for their spiritual fellowship, and, full of confidence in the future, they hold out a brotherly hand, in the name of Jesus Christ, to all Christians outside the present assembly, who like them are resolved to maintain unshaken the two ancient pillars of Protestant religion: faith and liberty, liberty and faith.

RESOLUTIONS AND PREAMBLE ADOPTED CONJOINTLY, AND PLACED AT THE HEAD OF THE DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES AND THE STATUTES.

Resolutions.

The members of the Assembly of Jarnac, desiring above all to accomplish a work of peace and brotherhood, and to render possible in the near future the rapprochement of the diverse elements of French Protestantism and their organization in one body,

Bearing in mind that, in the religious, political, and social crisis through which France is passing, God lays upon our Churches the duty of uniting together for common action,

Beseech all their brethren to hasten the convocation of a General Assembly, to be elected by the "Associations Cultuelles," such an assembly being desired by the immense majority of French Protestants, and having been formally decided both by the Synods of Reims and Montpellier and by the Liberal Assembly of Montpellier;

Expressly charge the committee appointed by the Jarnac Assembly to enter as early as possible into communication with the authorised representatives of existing groups, with a view to the prompt convocation of a General Assembly.

Preamble.

The members of the Assembly, in the desire and hope of preventing a permanent division among the Reformed Churches of France,

Full of confidence in the mercy and the promises of the Heavenly Father, Decide to draw up a Declaration of Principles and a Draft of Statutes which they submit to the General Assembly of the Reformed Churches.

In the meantime they propose and advise the Churches to unite at once, on the basis of this Declaration of Principles and of these Statutes. They instruct their Committee to take—on the request of the Churches—such steps as may follow from this decision.

But they solemnly declare that while provisionally adopting this constitution they do not claim to impose it on the Assembly to be convened, and that they desire to rally to a wider union voted by that Assembly and inspired by the same spirit.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

The representatives of the Reformed Churches of France assembled at Jarnac, October 24 to 26, 1906, acting in the spirit of the resolutions adopted at Rouen on the 11th and 12th of July, convinced that in the present circumstances the Holy Spirit lays upon them responsibilities which they can no longer avoid ;

Feeling their personal unworthiness—having implored the grace of God and deliberated together in peace and brotherliness ;

Recognising in the Churches the existence of a genuine need of intellectual sincerity, and a more and more conscious aspiration towards a fraternal unity founded on common religious experiences and upheld by a common desire for moral repentance, spiritual awakening, theological renovation, and social action ;

Determined so far as they are concerned, and so far as it depends on them, to preserve intact the faith and the liberty which made the greatness of the Reformed Churches of France ;

Being resolved to close the era of useless controversy in order to call all disciples of the Master to activity in good deeds, to the awakening of the Churches, to the evangelization of our Country, to missionary work, to the emancipation of souls that are being lost, to war against all the strongholds of sin for the triumph of the Kingdom of God upon earth in justice, love, and holiness ;

In fellowship of spirit with the Reformed Churches of France which expressed their faith in the sixteenth century in the confession of La Rochelle, and in the nineteenth in the Declaration of 1872, and with all the Churches that are descended from the Reformation ;

Proclaim joyfully and with all their heart :

(1) Faith in Jesus Christ, "the Son of the living God," supreme gift of the Father to suffering and sinful Humanity, who, by his holy life, his teaching, his death on the cross, his resurrection and his abiding action on souls and in the world, saves to the uttermost all those who are brought through him into union with God, and lays upon them the duty of working for the building up of the City of justice and brotherhood ;

(2) The unique religious value of the Bible as a record of the progressive revelations of God ;

(3) The right and the duty, for believers and for Churches, of free inquiry according to the rules of scientific method, and of work for the reconciliation of modern thought with the Gospel ;

(4) The distinctly lay and popular character of religious associations, the brotherly co-operation in the parish of all ministers and laymen, each one placing at the service of the rest the gifts he has received ;

(5) The maintenance of the Presbyterian synodal system, which implies the religious, administrative, and financial autonomy of the parishes, and their solidarity as a confederation of Churches.

Finally, therefore, being bent above all on realising the union of hearts and wills, they invite all believers and Churches to join them, who desire to uphold and propagate the essential principles of the Gospel and of the Reformation.

CHESTER WELCOME MEETING AND PRESENTATION.

ON Monday evening, Nov. 5, meetings were held in Matthew Henry's Chapel to welcome the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, the new minister, and his wife, and to do honour to the venerable pastor emeritus of the congregation, the Rev. J. K. Montgomery. Mr. Arthur Johnson presided at the welcome meeting, and he and Mrs. Maurice Williams and Mr. Oliver gave expression to the cordial welcome of the congregation and Sunday-school, while the Rev. J. R. Jones, of Aberdare, bore testimony to the good qualities of the new minister, whom he had known all his life. He had been Sunday-school teacher and choir leader, then minister and leader of the musical festival in his district, and had been made president of the South Wales Unitarian Association. He was a Welshman with unbounded enthusiasm for his work. The Rev. J. K. Montgomery, formerly for so many years minister of the chapel, and still resident in Chester, joined in the welcome, and the Rev. H. D. Roberts (another former minister), the Revs. H. F. Short, J. C. Street, and T. Lloyd Jones also added their good wishes, which Mr. Evans gratefully acknowledged.

The occasion was also taken on the same evening to make a presentation to the Rev. J. K. Montgomery on behalf of the South Cheshire District Association. This took place at a meeting in the school-room, over which Mr. Arthur Orrett presided. In addition to those already mentioned, the Revs. Dendy Agate, D. Davis, and G. Peglar were also present. The Rev. H. E. Haycock, another former minister, telegraphed his regret at being unable to be there.

The presentation, which was of an illuminated address (read by the Rev. H. F. Short) was made by the Rev. JAMES C. STREET. The address, which was in affectionate terms, bore a high tribute to the services rendered through long years by Mr. Montgomery to the cause of truth and education, of social progress and religion. Mr. Street, in making the presentation, spoke of his friendship of fifty years with Mr. Montgomery, which had begun when he first entered the ministry. Mr. Montgomery, he said, during his exceedingly long series of years had rendered great service both to God and man. During all those years he had kept clearly shining before him a keen and high sense of duty, and had set a noble example to ministers much younger than himself. To wear the white flower of a blameless life for ninety years was only given to few of the sons of men. But Mr. Montgomery had worn it, and was wearing it to-day. To-day his hair was snowy with many winters, and his experience could look back upon very many phases of life, yet throughout them all he had gone clearly, honourably, and nobly forward, inspired with a love for sweetness, holiness, and truth.

The Rev. J. K. MONTGOMERY acknowledged the presentation with much feeling, and read a reply, in which he acknowledged the many blessings of his long life, and especially the exceeding kindness of his friends.

"Your address," he said, "has set up a high (but not too high) ideal even for a minister of the gospel of love and joy and peace, but the real does not often accord with the ideal, and I cannot conceal from myself that I have never more than come within sight of it. I am reminded that it is for us when we have done all, to say that we are unprofitable servants. We have but done that which was our duty: Happy for those who can say so much. Let me say in conclusion that I only hope I may be worthy of the blessings of which we speak and of the high ideal and affectionate appreciation of the life work and spirit which you so kindly say has been useful to others. It is reward enough that any sympathy in word or deed of mine has been helpful to any fellow-worshipper or fellow-worker. I have no desire or ambition other than being useful to and winning the regard and affection of those among whom I have lived and laboured. I end as I began by heartily thanking you for your affectionate address and for its closing desire that the last years of my life may be fuller of blessing and crowned when the end comes with the great 'well done, good and faithful servant'; nor can there be any higher prayer for any of you and for those to whom I trust your address may ever be the memorial of the long and strenuous life of your affectionate brother and fellow-worker, J. K. MONTGOMERY."

A vote of thanks to the chairman for presiding brought the meeting to a close.

A GLASGOW JUBILEE.

THE Glasgow Unitarian Church was founded in 1810 ; and the building in St. Vincent-street in which the congregation at present worships was opened in 1856, early in the ministry of the late Dr. Crosskey. In commemoration of the latter event, jubilee services and other meetings were held last month. A report sent at the time went astray, hence the lateness of this record. The special preachers were the Revs. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester ; Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne ; and James Harwood, of London ; while on the fourth Sunday the minister of the church, the Rev. James Forrest, brought the series to a close. All the services were most helpful to the members of the church, and considerable interest was aroused outside our own community. The congregations, despite most unfavourable weather on three of the four Sundays, were large and enthusiastic, and many strangers were present who had never before been inside the church.

Besides the Sunday services two other meetings were held that merit special notice. On the evening of Monday, October 22, a Jubilee Social meeting took place in the Queen's Rooms, at which about two hundred and fifty were present. On this occasion the congregation were delighted to have with them a large number of friends from the South, as well as ministers and representatives from nearly all the Scottish Unitarian churches. Dr. Barlow and Mr. Forrest received the members of the congregation and friends, and after tea the former, who presided, was accompanied to the platform by Miss Marian Pritchard (Aunt Amy), the Revs Dr. S. M. Crothers, Dr. John Hunter, James Harwood, R. B. Drummond, W. Copeland Bowie, J. Forrest, and Mr. Ion Pritchard. All the speakers heartily expressed their congratulations and good wishes on behalf of the church, the addresses by Drs. Hunter and Crothers, and Miss Pritchard being particularly helpful and inspiring. In every way the meeting was a signal success, and was a time of great refreshing to all. The following evening Dr. Crothers lectured in the church to a very large gathering. His subject was: "The Present Crisis in the Christian Church," and his treatment of it was a veritable inspiration and delight. For over an hour he held his audience spell-bound, and the uplifting influence of his wise and informing words, and gentle, cheery optimistic spirit, will long remain with all who had the privilege to listen to his clear convincing statement of the church's present duty and opportunity.

These Jubilee Celebrations have given the St. Vincent-street friends a splendid send-off on this season's work. Young and old have been enthused with hope and courage, and expect for long to reap a harvest of good in increased interest and earnestness among the members of the congregation, and an accession of numbers from among the many unattached liberal religionists in the city of Glasgow.

A CORRESPONDENT has sent us a cutting from the Christian Herald of Nov. 8, containing an article by the Rev. Dr. Leach, headed "Conversion of a Unitarian Minister." We were naturally interested to know who this was, but the article, which is written very much to edification of the orthodox readers of the Christian Herald, gives no name or date, and Dr. Leach must forgive us if we are sceptical as to the exact truth of the conversation held with the convert, as he has recorded it. For there is clue enough in the article for us to be able to identify Dr. Leach's man, and his "conversion" happened seven years ago. He was not originally a Unitarian, but was trained for the ministry, and for seven years was a minister of the United Methodist Free Church (beginning in 1875). Subsequently, as a Unitarian minister, he cannot be said to have been a success. If, as Dr. Leach says, this "able and well-read man" is now "a useful and able Congregational minister in Yorkshire," and "has done and is doing good service for Jesus Christ," we must all be glad of that.

THE "NEW THEOLOGY" AND UNITARIANS.

SIR,—In the columns of THE INQUIRER and also of the Daily News, Mr. Page Hopps takes me to task, with a kind of bitter suavity, for some alleged statements in respect of Unitarianism. Mr. Hopps bases his attack on a short newspaper report of a necessarily long, argumentative, and somewhat abstruse sermon on the "Divine Immanence." If he had reflected for one moment he would have come to the conclusion that the chances were a thousand to one against such a report being reliable, adequate, or in any real way accurate. There is, as a matter of fact, absolutely no ground for the position he takes up with respect to myself, save in the defectiveness of the report in the columns of the Daily News. The question of Unitarianism came into my sermon simply as a passing side issue. I said that some people tried to damn the modern movement in theology by speaking of it as a "going over to Unitarianism"; and I said that such folk did not know what they were talking about. For them Unitarianism meant a denial of the divinity of Jesus; and I said that it was the old Unitarianism that denied the divinity of Jesus, and that modern Unitarianism did not; and then I said that so far from "going over" to the Unitarianism which denied the divinity of Jesus, the "new theology" asserted the Divine Immanence over against the deistic conception of God on the ground of which the denial of Christ's divinity was, and was necessarily, made.

Upon this subject I know what I am talking about, and am accustomed to speak with frankness and fairness; nothing could possibly be further from my mind, or, indeed, from the spirit of my ministry, than an attempt to disparage Unitarians or Unitarianism, or to differentiate between them and myself to their disadvantage.

And I know many men who share this spirit with me. It was, therefore, a matter of surprise and disappointment to me to find Mr. Page Hopps, on so questionable a provocation, leaping publicly into the arena, only to discover himself without an antagonist, stamping the dust and beating the air.

THE VAN MISSION.

A FURTHER DEVELOPMENT.

SIR,—I have pleasure in announcing that the Van Mission movement has this week received another splendid impetus. A van is promised for London and the South, and its donor will provide the whole cost of maintenance during the coming year. Three vans are thus secured and the working expenses of two of them are covered. The fourth van is still required. The only criticism of the policy of having four vans has arisen from a fear that it may be impossible to find men to work them. It may assure those who fear that we are over-sanguine if I state that in our Committee the question of men has occasioned far less difficulty than that of finance. There were 50 volunteers this summer; and 80 men would suffice for all needs. If parts of Lancashire and Yorkshire can find 50 men, the rest of the country will easily find 30 others. In fact, I believe we could count beyond that number already.

Rochdale. THOS. P. SPEDDING.

ASSOCIATION SUNDAY.

SIR,—Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to the collections which will be taken in a large number of churches on Sunday, November 18, on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association?

Circulars and letters have been issued to ministers and secretaries of congregations. Experience shows that when people are informed of the large and varied missionary work of the Association at home and abroad the collections are always larger.

The efficiency and extent of the work which the Association undertakes must always depend upon the loyal and generous support of ministers and congregations all over the country. The committee are grateful for the confidence shown in their work, and the help rendered in the past, and they trust that the amount collected this year will exceed those of previous years.

Unitarians living remote from any church and those who are prevented from attending the services, can send their contribution to Essex Hall, if they are not already on the list of subscribers to the Association. The work is national and international, and merits the generous support of all good Unitarians.

YORKSHIRE MISSION CHURCHES.

SIR,—In the provincial letter in your last issue Mr. Ellis refers to the present prospects of starting new congregations in Yorkshire, but wisely points out the undesirability of adding to the number of struggling churches which will be a perpetual burden to the Central Mission. Some fifty years ago (I have not got the exact dates) the missions at Pudsey and Dewsbury and Pepperhill were started, and it was then fondly hoped and believed that the two former at least would, in the course of a decade or two, become self-supporting. The other aided churches at Elland, Lydgate, Doncaster, Selby, and Malton were old Presbyterian foundations which the Mission has taken up and helps to keep alive by grants from its funds. They are, therefore, not churches which the Mission has started, so that it can scarcely be said to have failed with regard to them. Our church at Huddersfield stands in a different category. I can remember the time when it was regarded as one of our middle-class congregations, but it fell upon evil days, and was finally closed; but after a time was re-opened by the help of generous friends in the hope that it might regain its former independence. It came, however, at length upon the Mission, and there, to all present appearances, it is likely to remain.

It was on Pudsey and Dewsbury, therefore, that the founders of the Mission staked their hopes of building up self-supporting churches. I know the inception of them both. I conducted services at each of them, as well as at Pepperhill and elsewhere, in my lay preaching days. I have watched their progress through the whole course of their history. But "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and I imagine this had often been the feeling of the founders who have now passed away. Our missions in Yorkshire can scarcely be called a success. In fifty years we have not raised a single independent church. And yet at both the places I have specially named there have been congregations, I venture to say, even greater than in many of our churches which receive no outside grant, and which we should all of us be sorry to see closed.

Now, I think time and experience have both demonstrated that we cannot raise independent churches out of purely working class people. If there be not among them some well-to-do people or commercial men, some few at least above mere wage-earners, who are able and willing to give substantial aid, then the case is hopeless. Such churches are nowhere large enough to become independent. What is to be done? Are we to continue on the old lines in our mission efforts and start new congregations which, like the old ones, will be a chronic burden on the Central Mission? This is a question which asks for serious consideration. With our present experience, it seems to me foolish, to say the least, to multiply churches which do not contain any promise of future independence. It is easy to do the former, but it seems impossible to achieve the latter.

For some time past the North and East Lancashire Mission has been showing the way out of this difficulty. That Mission has been as successful as any in the country, but it has profited by experience, and it recognises the fact that it must do something more than start new congregations, if they are ever to become self-supporting. And so it has wisely adopted the plan of encouraging its dependent churches to exert themselves to raise sustentation funds by supplementing what they raise from the central fund. Take the case of Horwich, whose pulpit I am now supplying, as an example, and it is one of the youngest of its mission churches. It now possesses £1,400 as a sustentation fund, and in future will be able to pay its way with comparatively little aid from the parent Mission. Other churches in the district are pursuing the same policy, and it was declared at the late meetings of the B. and F.U.A. in Leeds, by one who knows that district well and the inception of that movement that it would be the salvation of those churches. Cannot Yorkshire attempt something on the same lines, and work out the salvation of its mission churches? If it cannot, or will not, then it need not attempt any new mission efforts, for they will be futile, like those that have gone before:

Leeds, November 11, 1906. JOHN FOX.

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY.

NOVEMBER 25, 1906.

MR. W. R. MARSHALL, Organising Secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, writes from 31, Birkhall-road, Catford, S.E.:-

"As in previous years, I am anxious to gather up particulars of all the services held on this occasion. Already my list contains the names of over thirty of our churches where sermons on temperance will be delivered. Will those friends who have not yet sent in kindly forward particulars to me? I should be glad to receive any reports of services held. A full list will be prepared and published."

COAL MINING PROFITS.

SIR,—It would seem almost unnecessary to further controvert Mr. Robinson's figures, after the publication of the very conclusive official data sent you by Mr. Simon, but upon them Mr. Robinson founds such an astounding indictment of the employer that silence is impossible:

Mr. Robinson draws a distinction between "value at the pit's mouth" to which the Board of Trade figures relate, and "what is being obtained for the coal when sold by the colliery proprietor." The two are precisely the same, and though, for a small percentage of the output such prices as Mr. Robinson mentions may be obtained, the average for all qualities works out at a very much lower figure:

I will not discuss further Mr. Robinson's statements as to the direct responsibility of employers for the serious evils of the social state, or the effects of public opinion "in minimising the profits made out of labour." I merely wish to establish facts, and will therefore conclude by giving the average amount of royalty paid in Lancashire and Cheshire as given by the Royalties Commission (1889), namely, 6d. per ton.

F. EDWIN ARMSTRONG.

Bedworth, Nuneaton, Nov. 11.

SIR,—If you care to publish another letter on miners' wages, I will say, in reply to Mr. R. Robinson, that the figures I quoted were, of course, averages. As several members of a family often work together, the joint income of a family is usually, and probably, even in the districts referred to, a very comfortable one. Otherwise the men who only get 16s. 8d. a week would presumably soon migrate. The different prices for different qualities of coal can also be averaged. If an employer paid his men more than they earned he would soon find himself unable to pay them anything. But I know that Mr. Robinson will not be satisfied with mere facts. When he meets poverty or suffering, such as could not exist in the ideal world he seems to picture for himself, he hastens to throw the blame on someone, and landlords and capitalists are convenient and old-established bogies. I, on the other hand, regard landlords and capitalists as products of the natural selection by which Nature, or God in Nature, does the world's work. Their existence justifies them.

It is pleasant to dream of universal happiness, perpetual sunshine in man's life and in Nature, such as perhaps existed in the South Seas; but when we wake we find ourselves in a real life, as it has been for millions of years, shackled in chains of circumstance which we did not make and cannot alter.

RICHARD SIMON.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

THE ministers in the Eastern Counties have started their work this winter with enthusiasm and confidence. They have a strong feeling that there is now an opportunity of making headway, if the congregations will only seize it. Unfortunately, the members of our congregations, independent as they are, cannot rid themselves altogether of that constitutional reserve which is the bane of the people in the East. Even in rousing times we see none of that abandon which is so characteristic of Lancashire. We seldom hear a hearty shout. We are in hope, however, that the congregations will "let go," and will support the special services that are being held to make known the truths which have been entrusted to us. We have, I fear, among us—as many of our churches have—those who are not eager for propaganda, and who would be overcome with shame if they made a proselyte. Like others, they have not perceived that the open-trust principle does not mean indifference to truth or feebleness in the proclamation of truth; and that it is only by being clear and emphatic in declaring what we know to be true, that we can prepare the way for that higher and purer religion, which we believe and trust will be preached when our lips are silent. What can be done in the Eastern Counties was shown by the splendid audience which gathered in the Octagon Chapel to listen to Dr Crothers when he re-delivered his Essex Hall lecture.

Special courses of services are being delivered at Braintree, Ipswich, Norwich, and Yarmouth: At Braintree Mr. Fuller has secured able help from outside in the following speakers:—Sir Thomas Fuller, K.C.M.G., Agent-General for Cape Colony; Mr. F. Maddison, M.P.; and the Rev. W. C. Bowie. At Norwich a great number of strangers—chiefly young and middle-aged men—were present at the opening sermon of the course last Sunday. For advertising these addresses we are indebted to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

It is a relief to the members of the Eastern Union Executive to hear that the Rev. J. M. Connell is settling as minister of Bury St. Edmunds. For seven years we have discussed the question of work there at every committee meeting we have held. Mr. Connell may be assured of a hearty welcome and continued support from us. His advent means the cessation of one of our woes. He has undertaken a hard task; he will have much to live down, for the services have been of a very spasmodic nature; but Mr. Connell has the character that will win respect for our church and cause there.

The church at Lynn is at present closed. Some of us are hopeful that it will be re-opened at the beginning of the year. An attempt is being made by the Eastern Union Executive to form a Lay Preachers'

Union, which will be of service not only to Lynn, but to our churches generally. We cannot always tell what preaching ability we have in our midst, and I trust that if this paragraph falls under the eye of anyone, whether in country or town, who feels that he can occasionally—even if only once or twice a year—take a service, he will at once write to me. Seeing what lay preachers do in other denominations, it will be lamentable if we cannot find strength enough to open and keep going one place of worship, however isolated.

We come to the important question raised by a correspondent in the columns of THE INQUIRER a fortnight ago. Can nothing be done for those Unitarians who live miles away from our churches? Is it not possible to form "a Church for the Solitary"? Mr. Ellis partly gave the answer to this question last week. It was Mr. Ellis's experience, announced some months ago, that made the ministers in the Eastern Counties decide that they would not be justified in incurring expense by advertising that they would be willing to supply isolated Unitarians with literature, sermons, and what other help they could. We learnt from Miss S. S. Dowson that the number of replies to her advertisements from those living in our district was not large. And this, notwithstanding the fact that Miss Dowson is one of the most able and diligent workers of the Postal Mission, and only last year wrote 609 letters to people of various trades and callings in 116 places in the British Isles. We are justly proud of this work, and rejoice that information and guidance are being thus given to many at a distance. But we regret that there do not appear to be those in the country districts of our own counties who could be formed into "a Church of the Unattached." If, however, there are half-a-dozen friends, who are prepared to be members of such a movement, the Eastern Union Executive would readily undertake this work. I shall be glad to receive names. We are hoping that one day a Van will arrive in our district, for we believe our villages contain many people who would rejoice to hear our message. A great field is open to us, and though we are only nine ministers, we would do our best to supply a missionary every night. We believe that the Van would be our easiest way of forming a Church of the Unattached. We have heard of the Van's triumphal procession through Lancashire and Yorkshire (those two counties have had so much wear and tear out of it that we think they ought to purchase and maintain it, and so make another Van possible), but—it may be that we do not read our reports as carefully as we should—are any definite steps being taken to link the people who hear us gladly with our denomination? Would it not be well to make known that the missionary would be pleased to receive names and addresses, and that they would endeavour to supply those desirous of learning more with literature and other help from time to time? There must be many men in lonely places who have time to think, and who are beset with religious difficulties, and desire to worship God in a way that commends itself more to their conscience than the orthodox way.

Meanwhile, if we could discover the number of those in certain centres who are interested in a Liberal faith, something could be done. If at Lowestoft and Southwold, for instance, we found a dozen friends, the Revs. John and Wm. Birks, the Rev. R. Newell, and I would hold monthly or fortnightly services on some week evening. Here, again, we must ask some enthusiastic friend or friends to write to one of these ministers. At Felixstowe, with the support of Mrs. Manning Prentice, Mr. Tavener has made a beginning. He has lectured there; and a small committee has been formed to see whether religious services cannot be regularly held. It is proposed to hire a hall for Monday evenings, and if the size of the congregations does not justify the outlay, services will be held in the drawing-room of one of the members.

Some of your readers will wish to know what progress is being made with the Martineau Memorial. I must not anticipate the statement which will be sent to you in the course of a few days by Mrs. Mottram, the energetic treasurer of the Fund.

ALFRED HALL.

20, Mount Pleasant, Norwich.

NORTH LANCASHIRE AND WEST-MORELAND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting was held at Preston on Saturday, November 3. At the service in the afternoon in the Unitarian chapel the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson was the preacher, and after tea in the new schoolroom, of which about 120 people partook, the chair was taken for the annual meeting by the President, the Rev. J. CHANNING POLLARD, of Lancaster. He extended a cordial welcome to Mr. Dowson, and to Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. A resolution of thanks to Mr. Talbot for his presence and to the Association was moved by the Rev. H. V. MILLS, of Kendal, and seconded by the Rev. C. TRAVERS, of Kendal. Mr. TALBOT, in responding, said that the Association in its work wished above all things not to encroach on the liberty of others, but to leave them free to do their own work. Without the freedom they inherited they would not have been where they were that day.

The Rev. R. McGEE, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Dowson, said he was one who had come from Congregationalism to Unitarianism. Their liberty was a great and glorious thing, and none could appreciate it more than those who had felt the need of it through being creed-bound, and those who felt the only liberty they had had, had been the liberty of silence and not the liberty of speech. In the Unitarian churches they had the liberty of speech; they had the open door, and feared nothing. Even Atheism they had a message for. It was astonishing the confusion that existed in the popular mind as to the meaning of Unitarianism, and many held aloof because they did not understand them. He thought they ought to have in them the spirit that would lead them to go out, not necessarily with a van, but out in the streets to tell the people what they believed, not merely what their ism was, but to proclaim the great and grand conception of God, the common Father. They had a simpler, greater message for the people than their friends of the narrow, orthodox churches, and he asked whether they as an association could not organise some mission services in the poorer districts of their towns or do something to have a sand mission at Blackpool.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. T. W. BUSHROD, and carried.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON, in responding, said they wanted a revival in the pulpit and in the pew, and he agreed that they wanted to go out. They had been much too content to wait for the mountain to come to Mahomet, and now Mahomet must go to the mountain. He thought they had not made enough use of the women in their congregations. The mothers had more of the making of religion in this country than all the rest of the people put together. He believed a great call had come to the women of England, and thought that a great new move would have to be made in education before that question was settled. There could be no settlement of that question on compromise. He did not know whether they were religious people who would drive them to it, but there was nothing for it but the State taking in hand the secular education and leaving to the home and to the church that which was their function—religious education: Had they ever found that the religious disestablishment of the Church had destroyed the life of that Church? They did not want the State to give them their religion; they would find it for themselves. What they as Unitarians wanted to feel was that they had a duty of their own in their churches and Sunday schools to improve religion in the hearts of the young people. If this goal was made they could face with a brave heart secular instruction given by the State. In conclusion, he referred to Unitarianism as the grandest religion the human heart could desire.

In the course of the business which followed, Mr. Sutcliffe, of Chorley, was appointed president, and the other officers were re-elected. The report referred to the growth of the new church at Ansdell, and it was welcomed into the Association.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast: Mountpottinger (Dedication of the New Sunday School).—The new school building given to the congregation by Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence as a memorial of their niece, the late Mrs. Jenkin Davies, whose husband was formerly minister of the Church, was dedicated on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, in the presence of a large congregation. A handsome porch and a committee-room have also been provided at the church by the congregation and friends. In the school there is accommodation for about 150 children. In the course of the service, which took place in the church, the Rev. J. Worthington read a letter from Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, conveying the gift of the school to the Mountpottinger.

congregation, and expressing their earnest hope that the new rooms would prove a real and lasting benefit. They felt very strongly how deep had been Mrs. Davies's interest in the work at Mountpottinger, and they knew how warmly she had always been received by the friends there. Mr. Worthington expressed the hope that this generous gift, and the memory of Mrs. Davies, would stimulate the congregation to greater sacrifice and to more earnest work amongst the young people. For the new vestibule at the church they were largely indebted to the Misses Riddell, whose contributions amounted to within about £50 of the required sum. Another £50 was necessary to meet incidental expenses, and towards that the members of the congregation had given a share. They had also received a good portion of it from those connected with All Souls' Church, Elmwood, and other friends in Belfast and district. On that occasion he took the opportunity of thanking all who had come to their aid, and he trusted that the congregation might not be found unworthy of their confidence. Rev. Dr. Mellone then offered the dedicatory prayer, and Rev. W. H. Drummond gave an earnest address on the meaning of that dedication, in the course of which he said that he had known Mrs. Davies many years before she was associated with Mountpottinger congregation, and from what he had seen of her work and earnestness elsewhere he could enter very fully into all he had heard of what she had done there. Let them value their school for her sake, and let it always be fragrant with the memory of her gracious and womanly character. They were dedicating that day not only their new school, but also an addition to their church. That gave him occasion to remind them of the wider opportunities opened up for both the teachers in the Sunday-school and the congregation. Their church was placed in the midst of a teeming population. All around them there were human beings burdened with sorrow, groping their way in the darkness, and wanting the spiritual help and comfort they could give. They should be a light in that neighbourhood. There should be an earnest missionary spirit in their church, for they had not fulfilled their duty as a Christian congregation when they had simply looked after their own affairs. A selfish church was a contradiction in terms, because it was not animated by the spirit of Jesus Christ. As they took up their larger opportunities in that district, let them have the courage to forget themselves, and follow the example of their Saviour, who gave His life for the world. After the service tea was served in the new schoolroom to visitors and members of the congregation.

Bootle.—On Thursday, November 8, the Rev. J. M. and Mrs. Mills held their annual "At Home" to inaugurate the winter's work. Addresses on church affairs and prospects were delivered by the Revs. J. M. Mills and H. W. Hawkes and Messrs. F. K. Wilson, W. J. Pidgeon, and W. Dixon. Much pleasure was expressed at the presence of Mrs. Mills, who is now well on the way toward perfect recovery from her recent illness. It was announced that special efforts were being made to arouse interest in the borough with regard to such national evils as "Sweating," "Slum Problems," &c. The usual vote of thanks terminated an enjoyable and inspiring meeting.

Clydach Vale.—Anniversary meetings were held in the Unitarian Church on October 28 and 29, the preachers being on Sunday Rev. J. Davies, Allt-y-placa; Rev. J. Hathren Davies, Cefn Coed; on Monday evening, Rev. R. J. Jones, Aberdare, and Rev. D. G. Rees, Bridgend. The occasion was one of special rejoicing, as the congregation celebrated at the same time its achievement of freedom from debt. The chapel had been most artistically decorated for a harvest thanksgiving service, which was conducted by Rev. J. Davies on Sunday afternoon.

Croydon.—On Sunday, November 11, the Free Christian Church was attended by the Mayor, Aldermen and Councillors, together with the Recorder and Town Clerk. The newly-elected Mayor, Mr. H. Keatley Moore, being a member of the congregation, received and accepted an invitation to the morning service sent by the minister, Rev. W. J. Jupp, who preached an eloquent sermon appropriate to the occasion. Suitable anthems were well rendered by the choir, and hymns heartily sung by a full congregation completed a devotional and most impressive service.

Cullompton.—A letter of thanks, with a balance-sheet, has been issued by the Rev. J. Worthington and the officers of the Round Square Chapel to the subscribers to the Chapel Improvements Fund, which was initiated with a bazaar three years ago. The circular states that "the original design for various structural and sanitary improvements to the chapel buildings and for the addition of a boiler-house and offices, together with the provision of a suitable organ, was ultimately extended to the conversion of some recently unoccupied trust property into a dwelling-house. This house has now been let, with a garden, hitherto bringing in an annual rental of £1 5s., at the rate of £13 a year." The total receipts have amounted to £234 5s., and the payments to £224 7s. The balance in hand needs to be supplemented by a small further sum to meet the existing liabilities; and it is proposed to keep the fund open for the improved ventilation of the chapel and other purposes.

Gateshead.—On Nov. 8 and 9 a most successful bazaar was held in the Berwick Hall in aid of Unity Church. At the opening ceremony Mr. C. Carter, of Newcastle, took the chair, and after hymn and prayer the bazaar was formally opened by Mrs. John Pattinson, who, on the motion of the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, seconded by Mr. Christophers, and supported by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, President of the District Association, was cordially thanked for her presence and support. Mr. Pattinson, who responded, took the opportunity to thank the congregation for the little souvenir they had recently presented to him and his wife on the occasion of their golden wedding.

Heywood.—On Sunday morning last the Corporation of Heywood attended divine service at the Unitarian Chapel with the Mayor, Councillor David Healey, J.P. The procession, which was a very large one, was led by the Heywood Unitarian Temperance Reed Band, followed by the Mayor with the minister and the Town Clerk, and accompanied by the chairman, councillors, and magistrates of the borough. The chapel was crowded, and the minister, the Rev. T. Bowen Evans, preached an appropriate sermon from the words: "And he by his wisdom delivered the city."

Hindley.—The old Presbyterian chapel has recently had an addition made to its numerous mural tablets erected from time to time in remembrance of several of its devoted workers. On Sunday evening last, after an appropriate sermon by the Rev. John Moore, from the text, "Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours," the senior trustee, Mr. Abraham Hurst, unveiled a tablet bearing the following inscription:—"To the Memory of John Jones, a member of this Chapel, for 38 years Acting Trustee, and for 26 years the Superintendent of the Sunday-school. By his fidelity, integrity, and devotion he won the esteem of his fellow-worshippers, the gratitude of his scholars, and the admiration of his friends. Born July 10th, 1826; Died, January 26th, 1906. This tablet was erected by members of the congregation, scholars of the school, and other friends."

Huddersfield.—The newly-elected Mayor, Ald. Balmforth, stated to the council of the borough that on principle he had courteously declined the invitation to attend the Parish Church on Sunday, and intended in his private capacity to attend the Unitarian Chapel, of which he was a member, where members of the council would also be very welcome. The ex-Mayor and other members of the council, the Town Clerk, and other officials were present with the Mayor, in response to this invitation, at the morning service on Sunday, at the Fitzwilliam-street Church, when the service was conducted by the Rev. John Ellis, the district minister, who preached a special and most appropriate sermon on the religious aspects of social and civic work. A collection taken on behalf of the fund for providing free breakfasts for necessitous school children amounted to £1.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The "Pleasant Wednesday Evenings for Women" are now in full swing, numbering 200 registered members. It is good to see the church once a week so full of working women, whose bright, homely faces are eloquent of the thorough enjoyment which these meetings afford to them. The members of the "Women's Friendly" are proud and grateful for the complete success of this new venture, which is so largely due to the brave self-denying efforts of their visiting committee. They will be glad to pass on the secret of their success to any other church willing to start a similar work.

London: Essex Church (Welcome Home).—A meeting of the Congregational Society was held on Wednesday evening in the school-room, when a very cordial welcome home was given to the Rev. F. K. Freeston, after his two months in America, where he was exchanging with Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass. There was a large gathering of friends. The room had a festive aspect, and some delightful music added greatly to the pleasure of the evening. Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, chairman of the Church Committee, who presided, and Mr. Edgar Worthington in terms of warm welcome expressed the pleasure of the congregation in having their minister back again, and congratulated him on having arrived home in such good condition. Mr. Freeston, in reply, gave a most interesting address, bearing witness to the exceeding kindness with which he had been received in Cambridge and Boston, and proceeding to give some of his impressions of New England and our churches over there. We shall not report the address, because we hope to have next week an article from Mr. Freeston himself on the subject.

London: Forest Gate.—The Rev. H. Woods Perris and Mrs. Perris opened the Literary and Social Union on Oct. 13 with a very successful "At Home" which was well attended. On Oct. 31, Mr. H. S. Perris delivered a rousing lecture on "Militarism in England," and on Nov. 9, Mr. W. H. Evans, with a short paper on "Disinterested Management as a Temperance Solution," initiated an animated discussion. In view of the number of new-comers, a change in the organisation of the society has been made this year so as to include some of the more enthusiastic as members of the committee, and there is every prospect of a most successful and profitable session.

London: Ilford.—Notwithstanding the absence through illness of several members the attendance numbered thirty-six last Sunday, when the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, of Woolwich, preached at the Broadway Assembly Rooms on "A Modern View of Prayer." A sewing party has been formed by the ladies of the congregation, to prepare for a sale of work, which will probably be held a year hence, to provide the funds to meet the cost of building a permanent meeting-house.

South Cheshire and District Association and Sunday School Union.—The autumnal meetings were held at Newcastle (Staffs.) on Saturday, Nov. 3. Representatives were present from Shrewsbury, Chester, Congleton, Nantwich, and Crewe. The business meeting was held at 2.30 p.m., the Rev. J. C. Street in the chair. The Rev. D. Davis, of Nantwich, conducted a religious service at 3.15, preaching an able sermon on the text Rev. iii. 20. About fifty persons sat down to tea at 4.30. A conference was held at 5.30, when the Rev. H. Fisher Short (hon. sec.), gave an address on "A Plea for Systematic Instruction in our Sunday-schools." An animated discussion followed.

Stockport.—A rousing meeting was held in the Unitarian Church on Saturday, Nov. 3, one of a series arranged by the East Cheshire Christian Union in the churches of the district for the sake of closer fellowship and more devoted service of God and man. Colonel J. G. Johnson, V.D., presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. J. E. Manning, E. L. H. Thomas, J. H. Rossington, and B. C. Constable, minister of the church. As part of the same effort special services were held on the following Sunday.

THE MAKING OF RELIGION.

The Essex Hall Lecture for 1906.

BY

SAMUEL M. CROTHERS, D.D.

Author of "The Gentle Reader," "The

"His whole argument goes to prove that religion is 'begotten, not made,' that it emerged from an unseen source like a tiny stream, and has swelled into a noble river with the accumulated experience of a hundred generations. The Lecture is almost an illustration of the theme; beginning with a simple illustration, there flow in under the magic of the speaker's chastened eloquence, tributaries of history, philosophy, poetry, ethics, and religion accumulating and swelling until it seems to sweep everything before it."—Christian Life.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, for six Sunday evenings, beginning on Sunday week, December 2. The service will be conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, minister of the chapel.

THE article "From Old to New England," by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, leaves us with the hope of more for next week.

THE first annual meeting of the Unitarian Van Mission is to be held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday next at 3 o'clock. At 7 a public meeting will be held in the interest of the Mission, the President of the Missionary Conference, the Rev. J. C. Pollard, of Lancaster, in the chair. A copy of the annual report, giving a full account of the first season's work, may be had on application to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, 91, Tweeddale-street, Rochdale.

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY is to be widely observed to-morrow throughout the churches. In this connection we are glad to take the opportunity of calling attention to a very admirable "Outline of the Temperance Question," recently published by Miss Catherine B. Drummond, of Oxford (Church of England Temperance Society, 4, The Sanctuary, Westminster, price 3d.). Its motto is a saying of Cobden's

"The temperance cause lies at the foundation of all social and political reform," and the outline furnishes a careful statement of the chief aspects of the question, to encourage further inquiry. "We possess now," the preface says, "an invaluable literature on the subject of the drink traffic—medical and scientific, social, historical, and political; and if this little pamphlet leads some to study these larger works, the aim of the writer will have been fulfilled."

MISS DRUMMOND'S "Outline" is divided into three parts: I. Alcohol and the Human Body; II. Alcohol and the Nation. In this part are chapters on expenditure, direct and indirect, and on the connection of drink with social problems. III. Alcohol and the State, with chapters on licensing legislation (referring to Sidney and Beatrice Webb's "History of Liquor Licensing in England"), compensation, and reform. The medical and scientific objections to the use of alcohol in drink are pointedly stated, and then in the second part the facts as to the enormous drink bill of the nation and its results are marshalled. The average annual expenditure of the people of the United Kingdom on intoxicating liquors during the past ten years is stated as £176,000,000, an expenditure very largely destructive even among "moderate drinkers," of the manhood and welfare of the nation, while as to the trade itself, which, of course, employs an enormous number of people, Miss Drummond says: "The drink trade gives nothing useful in return for money spent; it employs far fewer people in proportion to its capital than any of our larger trades, and it is a trade dangerous to all employed in it, the death-rate of brewers, publicans, and their servants being higher than that of people engaged in any other trade, even the so-called dangerous trades." To substantiate this statement figures are given from the Registrar-General's report. Then, as to the revenue from the trade, at least half of which, it is calculated, has to be paid back for the fruits of our drinking habits, see the quotations from Rowntree and Sherwell's "Temperance Problem and Social Reform" of the statements of Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote on the subject. "With a sober population, not wasting their earnings," said Gladstone, "I shall know where to obtain the revenue."

"FOR every pound spent on drink, it has been estimated that the country pays another pound for the damage done by drink, and thus the original bill is doubled." That is £176,000,000 a year twice over, which might go to the making of a healthy, prosperous, and happy people! The bearing of this subject on questions of social reform is painfully familiar. Thus Miss Drummond quotes from Mr. J. S. Nettlefold, chairman of the Housing Committee of the Birmingham City Council: "Few people not immediately connected with, or intimately interested in housing reform and rescue work in the slums of our large cities realise to the full how great an effect the drink evil has on our social miseries, and therefore it is necessary to emphasise this branch of the housing problem."

WE trust that Miss Drummond's "Outline of the Temperance Question" will be widely read, and used as a basis for study and instruction. These are its concluding words:—"In bringing to a close this sketch of some aspects of the Temperance question there is one thing on which I wish to lay particular stress: the best weapon with which we can fight the drink traffic is knowledge. Whether working quietly amongst the victims of the traffic, or trying to influence the members of our own social circle, or taking part in temperance meetings, or working for legislative reform, without a careful study of the influence of our drinking habits, physical, social, and political, in the lives of the people, our work must be ineffective. No one listens to the arguments of an uninformed person, no one is really influenced by him, and only by the pressure of an enlightened public opinion can we expect any large and lasting measure of reform."

IN connection with Temperance Sunday, the organising secretary of the N.U.T.A., Mr. W. R. Marshall, 31, Birkhall-road, Catford, S.E., is anxious to issue a complete list of our churches in which temperance sermons are preached to-morrow; but that can only be done if friends throughout the country will send particulars to him.

THE Education debate in the House of Lords was varied this week by the introduction, and withdrawal, of an amendment by the Archbishop of Canterbury which was designed to set up State-aided schools pretty much on the lines of the "voluntary" schools as they existed before Mr. Balfour's Act of 1902. This remarkable proposal is about as pointed a criticism on that Act as well could be. Readers will remember that the Act originated in the outcry of managers of the schools referred to against the "intolerable strain" involved in maintaining their schools. To the gratified amazement of the clerical party Mr.

Balfour put the rates at their command, and all seemed rosy: But the inevitable claim for full public control followed, and now it is evident that the denominationalists deplore the "fatal gift" of their modern Constantine. The fact that the amendment was dropped as soon as it emerged into the light of discussion speaks volumes. For good or ill, the old system is dead and gone, and we must work out its bequests as best we can, in hope of clear emancipation some day.

THERE appears to be some ground for hope that, following the strong hints given by the Government, a more conciliatory attitude will be shown by the Opposition Peers, including the Bishops, when the Education Bill comes up for report next week. A deputation of moderate-minded Churchmen, of whom the editor of the Spectator, Mr. St. Loe Strachey, is representative, is to wait on the Archbishop of Canterbury with a view to mediating; and if such negotiations lead to a working agreement everyone, except extremists, will rejoice. We confess, however, that the prospects of anything but a temporary arrangement, which will have to be revised in a few years, seem to us to be still remote.

REFERENCE has been made in the discussion on the "New Theology" and Unitarianism to the view held by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong. In this connection the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, of Hinckley, reminds us of a sermon preached by Mr. Armstrong, in Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, on October 8, 1893, and published in the Liverpool Pulpit of that month. "The New Bible" was the subject of the sermon, in the course of which Mr. Armstrong spoke of the manifestation of God in the lives of such men as Mazzini, Lloyd Garrison, and Theodore Parker, and such devoted women as Frances Willard and Josephine Butler, and then went on:—

"And we look back across the centuries to him of Nazareth, the brightest son of man, and we see God in him. Yes, we, Unitarians as much as any others, see God in him; and some of us, as we sit at his feet and listen to the marvellous music of his word, use the term which has become so vulgarised by theological controversy, and we say that is an 'incarnation' of God. 'God in the flesh,' that is the phraseology which many use. Others of us express the same thing in language a little different. But the essential thing is that the Holy Spirit—the Living God—was there manifested through the flesh of man. And if 'Incarnation' be the term that best enshrines the truth of this mysterious relation, then God incarnates Himself in others also in degree. Nay; there is this Divine element, had we only spiritual skill to find it, in every child of man. You can draw no absolute line between the lowest and the highest."

WE quoted last week from the Annual Report of the Local Government Board. The following extract from the report of Mr. Preston-Thomas, the Inspector for Cornwall, illustrates in a striking way the dependence of pauperism on methods of industry:—"Much more serious, however, is the destitution caused by miner's phthisis, which, especially during the last few years, has combined with other lung diseases to make the death-rate from such diseases among miners in Cornwall no less than eight or ten times the corresponding death-rate among colliers and ironstone miners elsewhere in this country. According to the special report of a Departmental Committee appointed by the late Home Secretary (Parliamentary Paper 2091 of 1904) most of this mortality has been due to the effects of working in mines in South Africa, although a substantial portion is attributable to work in Cornwall, the predisposing cause in both cases being the inhalation of stone dust produced by rock drills and blasting. The Departmental Committee, as well as a Commission which investigated the question in the Transvaal, came to the conclusion that the danger might be prevented if the dust were laid by jets of water during the mining operations. It is to be hoped that measures of this kind will be enforced in future. But, as regards mortality in the past, its effect on the pauperism of the Redruth Union is considerable. Returns show that at the present time no less than 83 widows are being supported by the rates in consequence of the death of their husbands from miner's phthisis, and that they have as many as 250 children dependent on them, the total number of persons pauperised owing to this special cause being thus 333."

It is interesting to learn that some Wesleyan preacher was recently interrupted before he had finished his sermon, was accused of talking politics, and reminded that he was not in a Labour church. We were not present on that historic occasion; but, in the absence of definite evidence, we are almost inclined to envy that too effective preacher. So many sermons are taken in good part because they are so remote from practical interests, because a man's politics and his commerce and his industrial pursuits are so securely out of reach; we naturally think, when we hear of opposition, that it was a case of unusual faithfulness on the part of the preacher, or of unusual sensitiveness in the hearer. Neither of these is a bad sign.

THE reference to a Labour church is a reminder of the evils of denominationalism: Every special thesis is supposed to have its own appropriate place; political, theological, economical dogmas have each to be kept within its own proper walls. Men were shocked the other day not so much that certain truths were admitted, and certain doctrines preached, but that they were spoken out of bounds, in a Congregational and not a Unitarian church. Somebody needs to insist not only on the Unity of God, but the unity and inexorableness of Truth.

THE Laymen's Club continues its beneficial activity in promoting good causes, while pursuing the path of social entertainment. On Wednesday the Club gave a dramatic entertainment at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, on behalf of the "Boston Fund"; and London friends had the pleasure of enjoying the heartiest laughter as a means of assisting the deputation to the next International Council. The play, "His Excellency the Governor," though as dramatically thin as "the cause" was solid, was a mirthful success throughout, the parts being rendered with evident zest by a talented company, and the comedy (there was no tragedy in the plot) being received with evident appreciation by a large, though not crowded, audience. Where all acted so well, and at least half a dozen so remarkably well, it would be impossible to deal fairly without practically naming the whole cast. We must content ourselves with expressing what all who were present would feel—the debt owing to Mr. Herbert Lanford for producing the play, in addition to acting a part that brought tears, not of grief, to the eyes. We hope the performance will bring in a substantial addition to the fund.

MISS JENNETT HUMPHREYS, of 5, Oakgrove, Cricklewood, N.W., appeals for old boots and shoes for children big and little, not only for children of our own Sunday-schools, but for others of whom she gets to know in day school visiting and in Attendance Committees under the London County Council. "Week after week," she says, "parents are called up to give a reason why their children do not go to school when the law says they must; and week after week the answer is, 'They have no boots. And I am out of work. I cannot buy them any.' It is pitiful when this comes from a man, who scarcely likes to let the words leave his lips. And when the speaker is a widow! If some cast-off shoe leather could be sent to me here I should be glad in my heart."

A MINISTERS' Association in connection with the Methodist New Connexion has a circle for sociological study, this circle is announced as studying J. A. Hobson's "Problems of Poverty."

This month's Cornhill has a first article on "Shakespeare," by Canon Beeching, and Mr. E. S. P. Haynes writes on "Oxford and Cambridge—A Study in Types." Mr. Stanley Weyman's very interesting Reform Bill story "Chipping" is not yet finished, though it is already published as a separate book.

WITH the help of the Congregational Year Book for 1906, we were able last week to identify the Rev. Dr. Leach's Unitarian convert of seven years ago, of whom he had given an edifying account in the Christian Herald, but we are now informed that the minister in question is no longer in charge of a Congregational church in Yorkshire. It is not necessary for us to say any more on the subject.

THAT which ends in self is mortal; that alone which goes out of self into God lasts for ever.—F. W. Robertson.

ANOTHER FIRE AT AKUREYRI.

In this week, when we are publishing Mr. Armstrong's refreshing Iceland sermon, preached after his visit to that distant island in the summer of 1901, we hear from Mr. Matthias Jochumsson of another destructive fire at Akureyri. After the fire of December 19, 1901, Mr. Armstrong made an appeal, and we opened a fund by which we were able to send £123 3s. to Mr. Jochumsson (March 4, 1902) for the relief of the families rendered homeless and destitute in that little town of about 1,000 inhabitants, through the burning of the one hotel in the place and ten other houses.

Now Mr. Jochumsson tells us how, on the evening of October 18, fire again broke out in the northern quarter of Akureyri (Oddeyri), where a fine group of timber buildings had stood for the last four or five years. Mr. Jochumsson's own house stands on a hill overlooking this quarter, only five minutes' walk from the scene of the disaster. A westerly wind drove the fire straight down the street, and it was only checked when the wind happily changed, but after seven large buildings had been destroyed. They have fire engines now in Akureyri, but it is a new service, and the people, according to Mr. Jochumsson, showed little skill in fighting the tremendous conflagration. There is also telegraphic communication, which did not exist in 1902, and the King of Denmark telegraphed his sympathy, while the Government has encouraged the subscription opened for the relief of the sufferers.

The amount of property destroyed, and not covered by insurance (the rates of which are extremely high) has been estimated, Mr. Jochumsson states, by a committee of investigation at 40,000 crowns (about £2,000). We do not understand him to make any direct appeal for help, and without fuller information it is difficult for us to realise what the need is, and how far it has been already met; but undoubtedly a large number of poor working people were rendered homeless and destitute, and Mr. Armstrong's sermon will remind friends of the character of that people. If any of our readers are moved to send to Mr. Jochumsson gifts for the relief of the sufferers, they may be assured that he will administer such help in the best possible way. There are mails on November 28 and December 3.

THE Committee of the Peace Society 47, New Broad-street, E.C., are making a special appeal for funds. For some time the resources of the society have been subject to considerable strain because the work undertaken by it has grown considerably. Fresh agencies have been started, which have yielded most satisfactory results; enormous quantities of literature have been gratuitously distributed, especially in connection with Peace Sunday, so that the stock has been depleted, and new claims are continually rising. To replenish the stock of literature, and to meet the increasing demands for work, the committee very earnestly appeal for generous co-operation. To meet urgent necessities there is need for at least £1,200.

LESSONS FROM ICELAND.

A SERMON AFTER HOLIDAY.*

By RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

"And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last."—LUKE xiii. 30.

SINCE last I met you here in our church, I have travelled in a wonderful land. Bleak and bare, yet with a grand and noble beauty of her own, the Land of Ice, an island almost exactly the size of Ireland, stands boldly forth amid the wild Atlantic waves, the North-western sentinel of Europe. Hundreds of miles divide her from any continent. She lies at anchor there partly in the eastern, partly in the western hemisphere. With her mighty precipices, the islets round her coast, the sunken reefs, even to this day almost without lights to guide the mariner, girt by fog and storm, and with icy winds sweeping over her from the polar seas, she can be courted by the trader and seaman only at their peril. Not a tree that we in England should call a tree rears itself upon her soil. Again and again the burning lava has flowed over her hills and dales. The snow, unmelted through the ages, caps her mountain heights. The icebergs steer their course by her fjords and bays. The wild birds, in their millions, scream around her cliffs and caves, or whistle shrilly across her moors. Peat and bog and marsh cover vast areas of her face. Only 75,000 human beings find a home upon her strand or up the creeks that run into her interior. There is no town larger than a goodly English village. A living must be wrung from her inhospitable face by turning sheep or pony out on the moor to graze, or by daring the dangers of the deep in fishing craft. There is not altogether one square mile of thoroughly cultivated land. The wool may be spun and woven by hand for clothing. The fish may be caught for food. For all other articles of use or diet the Iclander must send across the seas. There is not even timber, save the sodden drift-wood of centuries of wreckage strewn upon the beach. He has little to give in exchange for what Scotland or Denmark may send him. His hut is roofed with turf, and looks but a green mound on the hillside. He speaks a tongue unknown to the stranger who visits him. He seems forgotten of God and man. His blotting out from the peoples of the earth would be but as the dropping of a small stone into the silent pool.

Yet these Icelanders have a history, a tradition, a literature, which may well stir the heart, and which extort the wonder of scholars and men of letters all over the European world. Up to a little more than a thousand years ago the only human dwellers in this rugged land were a handful of Irish, or their kin, who had found there a home far from the conflicts of their race. Then, in the year 874 of our Christian era, Viking chieftains from Norway began to sow it with human habitations, till all round the seaside fringe they were there, each with his retainers, and a rude commonwealth arose instinct with the wild, free temper of Scandinavia. Great marauders and robbers were the Vikings in those old days on the high seas. Shetlands and Orkneys, Hebrides and Man, and our own British coasts knew something of their prowess. But there in Iceland, even stronger than the spirit of feud was the spirit of brotherhood; and they desired to live together in peace and goodwill, each man doing justly by his neighbour.

And so in the great plain of Thingvellir, in the south-west district of the land, where the volcano and earthquake had ploughed mighty fissures in the rock, and in the dark depths of which glistened the clear black water, there between the fierce torrent of the Oxará and the broad ice-bestudded lake, with the snowy mountains marking the horizon on three sides, they assembled for counsel and for judgment, and for making of laws. And each chief built of great stones his little booth, covered with skins, where he lay at night during the sessions of the Thing; and to this day you may see the ruins of the booths of Níald, and of Snorri, and of others. And in his booth each chief had his narrow bed of skins to keep him warm, with flap at the head which he could fasten down that he might be snug and sleep the sounder.

And they were a heathen people, but the great ideas of right and of justice and of brotherhood had entered into their hearts, and, in spite of fierce feuds that leapt out now and again, they strove to live and to judge as the gods would have them to live and judge.

Then, just before the year 1000 by our reckoning, there came from the lands of the south one of their kin returning, eager with the message of Christ and of the Cross. And by fire and by sword he sought to set up the Gospel in his native land. And to Thingvellir he came riding over the moor and the moss and down through the great ravine, that he might persuade the council to proclaim the faith of Christ thenceforth the religion of the land. And the dispute waxed warm, till messengers came speeding to tell of a volcanic eruption, and how the lava threatened even the dwelling of the priest. Then some said: "What wonder that the gods are angry, seeing that you strive to depose them from their rule?" But others answered: "With whom then were the gods angry in the days of our fathers when far more terrible destruction was wrought by the burning streams?" For all men knew that the very soil on which they were gathered, and almost all their land was made by the seething lava. And so the dispute went on till they turned with one mind and will to Thorgeir, for Thorgeir was wise and good, and all the men of Iceland trusted him. And they said: "Thorgeir shall decide, and we will all abide by his decision." And though Thorgeir was a worshipper of the old gods, even the Christians agreed, for they knew that they could not gainsay the wisdom or the goodness of Thorgeir. So Thorgeir withdrew to his booth, and he lay down in his bed, and he drew the flap over his face, and for three days and three nights he lay and pondered in the darkness and the silence.

And at the end of that time he thought: "The Christians are few and the worshippers of the old gods many; but the religion of Christ will win its way. If we resist it, there will be quarrel and bloodshed. If we receive it, there will be peace and brotherhood." So he arose and went forth and declared that Iceland should be Christian. So in the year 1000, on June 4, when the days were long and the sun was bright, Christianity was proclaimed; and thenceforth Iceland was a Christian land.

And nine hundred years have passed away since then. For two hundred and fifty years the commonwealth endured. But by and by the island came under the sway of Norway, and later on, of Denmark. And the old liberties vanished; and only seven-and-twenty years ago, at the thousandth anniversary of the first Scandinavian settlement, did Iceland receive a modern constitution and the blessings of self-government. In the days of her ancient freedom she developed a literature more vivid and more virile than any which the world had known since the glory of Greek and Roman letters had faded out. But under Danish rule the inspiration died away, and famine and volcano and plague so scourged the land that the old spirit died away, and the Icelanders became a dull and listless man, melancholy of mood as his own long winter; and when Protestantism supplanted Romanism, it seemed to do but little for the emancipation of his mind, or the enfranchisement of his soul.

Then, about the middle of the nineteenth century, that same great wave of revolution, with its wakening and stimulating power, which swept over Europe and Great Britain, touched Iceland also; and from that day there has been a new life, and young Iceland is developing a character of her own and taking her place among the peoples.

It is this new character, obvious, I think, to every traveller, which has sent me to my text for some expression of what I feel in the Icelandic mind and heart.

"And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last."

What people, pretending to any civilisation at all could be further down the list of precedence, as the world counts precedence, than these same poor Icelanders? They are first of all of absolutely no count in the scale of nations. They are a dependency of one of the smallest of the European powers. Denmark herself counts for next to nothing in the minds of international statesmen, and Iceland counts for next to nothing in the politics of Copenhagen. Not one warship or one company of soldiers could Iceland contribute to a European struggle. And her economic rank is equally contemptible. The whole of her agricultural produce would be swallowed by one good Norfolk farm. Even her ponies and sheep, her great asset, number only a few tens of thousands. Her total export trade is just over one pound per annum for every thousand pounds of our own; and for all her imports, including grain and meal, sugar, coffee, salt, cotton, tobacco, spirits, hardware, timber, with none of which she can supply herself, she pays in a year just one third of what we are paying every week for war-expenses in South Africa.

Her military power and her economic importance are then absolutely negligible. If Hecla belched forth to-morrow lava enough to destroy her total population, only a handful of merchants in Copenhagen, Manchester, and Newcastle would be any the poorer, and there would be no other disturbance of the markets of the world than a rise in the price of Shetland ponies. Last and least is Iceland in all material things of the white communities of the world.

But her life—the actual mental and moral being of her people—what is that?

She has no school system, because the population is too sparse and scattered to gather children together in schools. Save in a few of the little settlements which pass as towns, there are no schoolhouses. In many districts the teacher passes from farm to farm, spending a month in each, to give the children their schooling for the year. In other districts the father and the mother are the only teachers. Yet it would be hard to find a child in Iceland who cannot read and write. In lonely homesteads remote from the intercourse of men, you will find little libraries of native books and translations of Shakespeare and Scott and Mill. Wherever your steamer touches as you thread the fjords, you will find that the brighter lads speak three languages—Icelandic and Danish and English. Poets and poetesses continually enrich the stores of song. Painting and music and sculpture have no mean growth. The long night of winter is brightened with reading and art; and the ancient scholarship of Iceland has revived in our time.

And in character, what are the people? They are honest as the day. You need none of the precautions against theft or cheating which are a necessity of civilisations deemed higher in the scale. Drunkenness is rare. Sobriety and thrift prevail. Simplicity of thought and speech and bearing are universal.

All these things make for happiness, and one seems to hear a voice of high authority say, "Friend, come up higher," when the Icelanders are set by the world low down at the table of life. But there are other virtues yet more striking, and by which we may measure the worth of men and communities without much fear of error.

Kindliness and cheerfulness: these count for much in any true measuring of the status of a community. Kindliness means a heart detached from self and at one with men; cheerfulness means a heart at one with God. A laborious life, an absence of all luxury, an absence of what most of us would deem decent comfort, the reward of toil and toil a bare sustenance, a poverty which shuts out most of the indulgences of life—these are not what most of us would deem the conditions for a cheerful bearing and a happy temper. Yet so far as the passing stranger could see there was no lack of cheerfulness on that Icelandic soil. They were happy faces that one met, faces of happy children playing on the beach, faces of happy youths and maidens gathered together for song at the great meeting we attended, bright and cheerful faces of women under the little black cap with the long silk tassel hanging at the side, strong and cheery faces of men pulling the oar in the boisterous sea or travelling the moor with caravan of ponies. Not but what under the cheerfulness there are often the signs of deep experiences of heart and soul, marks of past struggle and suffering such as that hard life must bring. From the Westmann Islands, with their wild and perilous cliffs there came rowing out to our steamer, in a tumultuous sea, a boatful of sturdy islanders. As their boat lay alongside while their captain climbed on board, I gazed on these sons of the storm and the precipice. I never saw faces more full of character and strength. Scarred with thought and the experiences of life, but with simple goodness written in every line—some of them plain in their simple manliness, others with features that would have made an Apollo—one at least who might have sat to Munkacsy or to Verestchagin for the Christ himself. But they were cheery, too, without trace of complaint or revolt against the sternness of their lot.

But if any may doubt of the cheerfulness of the Icelandic character, none can question its kindliness. See the gentle handling of the ponies, the comradeship between man and horse, the mutual understanding, the willing service of the beast of burden, the ready consideration of the master. See the courtesy in all ranks and classes, the comparatively rich or well-to-do treating with every gesture of respect the old woman under her burden in the field or the little child trotting along the bridle-path. See the affection, the mutual confidence, the good will between members of a family. See the readiness to take any trouble to oblige a stranger, the smile of welcome, the thoughtful service. This is a simple people; but in their simplicity they have kept unstrained all the best and strongest strands of manly and womanly character; and one feels they would be losers indeed, and the world would be the poorer, if for their simple and honest kindliness were substituted the push and bustle, the fret, the fume the eager competition, the self-absorption and self-seeking of such communities as those of Paris or New York, of London or of Liverpool.

We are apt to think of such communities as these as children. And children indeed they are. But are we always the better, nearer the kingdom of God, nearer the true kingdom of man, for putting childhood away from us? Some childish things, yes, these we must forego. But the spirit of childhood, the simplicity, the trustfulness, the kindness, the transparent truthfulness, were it not well, after all, if these could be kept even in the higher and advanced civilisations of the world? We are enormously richer, both individually and collectively, than Iceland, enormously more powerful, cut a far more brilliant figure in the history of the world, have a civilisation a hundredfold more complex. But, coming home from Iceland—bleak and poor though Iceland be—to England, luxurious and wealthy, yet with its great chasms between rich and poor, its ambitions, its struggles of life and death, its lust for rule, its materialistic measures of worth and greatness, I remember how one said long ago "Behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last"; and I wonder whether in the unsearchable thought of God Iceland is really last; whether in the thought of God England is really first. And I remember that one who spoke very confidently concerning the heart of God said that there were but two great commandments; nor was "Thou shalt make thyself rich" one of them; but one of them was that we should love the Lord our God with all our heart and mind and soul and strength, and the other that we should love our neighbours as ourselves.

THE EMPEROR JULIAN.*

JULIAN will be always an attractive figure for the historian and the dramatist, if for no other reason because he has had to bear the double burden of tragic failure and undeserved hatred. He was one of the idealists of the world, born when for him the times were out of joint, and his enemies have perpetuated their hatred for him in the insult of a rude nickname. It has become attached to him as securely as the epithet "great" to some other men. He will be always "the Apostate" now, for he was the last and possibly the most heroic figure in the long contest between the missionary zeal of Christianity and the Roman State with its neo-Greek culture and religion.

Signor Gaetano Negri has written an exhaustive biography of Julian, which has been translated into clear and pleasant English by the Duchess Litta-Visconti-Arese. The accomplished historian, Professor Villari, has supplied an introduction, in which he gives a few interesting particulars of the author's life, and points out what most readers will discover readily for themselves, a certain anti-religious bias in his mind. Signor Negri is not entirely free from the extreme form of continental rationalism, and his attitude towards Christianity and everything which is even on the border-line of theology is a little unbalanced and hostile. "A rational theology," he tells us, "is impossible. All attempts to found theology on reason have led to inevitable failure." This blemish, however, only appears occasionally, and hardly interferes with the even flow of his narrative or the faithfulness of the picture of the great religious contest which he is describing; and, in justice, it must be added, it detracts hardly at all from his admiration for an heroic figure like Athanasius. The book tells the story of Julian's life with considerable detail, and dwells justly upon his great qualities as a man and a soldier. His brilliant campaigns in Gaul, and his rapid march to Constantinople show him as a master of strategy, even if the quixotism of the Persian expedition, in which he met his death, must rob him of the title to military genius. But naturally most of Signor Negri's pages are devoted to the history of the religious revolution, which he set himself to accomplish with the impatience of an unpractised idealist during his very brief reign. Julian's object was to restore paganism, though it must be remembered that it was the paganism of a philosophical mind deeply imbued with the doctrines of neo-Platonism, and to destroy Christianity. The instrument which he employed for this purpose was a policy of toleration, which he must have convinced himself would work out to the serious disadvantage of the Christians. It cannot be described better than in the following passage from Ammianus Marcellinus:—"The time having arrived when he could do as he wished, he revealed to all the innermost secret of his heart, and, with an explicit and absolute decree, ordered that the temples should be reopened, that victims should be presented at the altars, and that the worship of the gods should be restored. And, to render this decision even more efficacious, the dissenting Christian bishops, with their congregations, were called to the Imperial palace and courteously admonished that as all discord was allayed, everyone, without fear, could worship according to his religion. Julian did this with the conviction that liberty would augment the discord, and that later on he would not have to fear a people united against him. He knew by experience that there were no wild beasts as cruel to man as the Christians among each other." What appeared to be a still more fatal blow was struck in the edict which closed the teaching profession in the State schools to Christian teachers. There can be little doubt that the object was to thrust back the Christian religion into barbarism by depriving it of all opportunities of liberal culture. Unfortunately, since Julian's day it has become a too familiar weapon in the armoury of religious persecution. But the new policy was put forward with a great show of moderation and reasonableness. Teachers, so the argument ran, who are to teach Homer and Hesiod and the other classical authors can only do so sincerely if they believe in the religions which these books teach. "We believe," Julian himself writes, "that good teaching does not consist in the harmony of words and speech, but rather in a disposition of the mind that has a true conception of good and evil, of honesty and dishonesty. He, therefore, who teaches in one way and thinks in another is not only far from being a good teacher, but is also far from being an honest man." Of the qualifications of a teacher in this respect there was one easy and sufficient test. He must frequent the temples and take part in their services, and he must never be found in the assemblies of the Christians. In regard to the scholars, Julian professed a policy of complete tolerance. "None of the youths," so the instruction runs, "who wish to enter the schools will be excluded, since it would not be reasonable to close the right path to children, who do not yet know in which direction to turn, as also it would not be right to lead them, by fear and against their will, to follow the national customs, although it might appear lawful to cure them against their will, as is done with the insane." In other words, there would be no exclusion of Christian children from the State schools, where they would be trained by teachers who held their appointments on condition that they should promote actively the cause of paganism in their teaching. We have only to substitute the Bible, the Creed, and the Catechism for Homer and Hesiod in order to discover an exact modern parallel.

There is probably no good reason for calling in question the sincerity of the Emperor's belief that he was completely tolerant in his educational policy, though he must have known that it was tolerance manipulated so as to secure his own ends. He made the mistake, so common since his day, of identifying his personal belief with the religion of the State, and then of invoking the aid of the machinery of the State to promote his particular form of religion in the name of freedom; Julian the Apostate is the patron-saint of the strict denominationalist in education, the inventor of that engine of oppression, religious tests for teachers in State schools. Lord Hugh Cecil is of his lineage, and most of his arguments were forged for him by this arch-enemy of the faith.

Julian spent his powers in the vain attempt to re-create the past. His fatal mistake was that he ignored history. In loyalty to his dream, he forgot the real world which moves. Dead faiths, dead languages, dead institutions, they should have the tribute which all that has been excellent deserves at our hands, but they cannot be brought back again. The man who devotes his energies to this impossible task is often endowed with a rare courage and sincerity; he may be almost sublime in the ardour of his loyalty and the heroism of his failure; but he is hardly to be reckoned among the benefactors of mankind.

THE "NEW THEOLOGY" AND UNITARIANS.

SIR,—I don't know about "stamping the dust and beating the air." What I said has drawn from Mr. Lewis a repudiation of the Daily News report, for which he might reasonably thank me; and, much more important, it has drawn from him the welcome intelligence that I am, so far as he is concerned, "without an antagonist." That is delightful. But there is still a doubt. Mr. Lewis now tells us that "The New Theology" stands for "The Immanence of God," by which, I suppose, he means the indwelling of God in all things and all creatures, including Jesus. But that is, at least, as old as Channing and Parker and Martineau, and, may I without egotism add, it is what I have been teaching all my life—or, say, for forty years. It is a trifle small and childish to contest the question, "Who got it first?" and that is not what I am doing. What I am doing is to contest the rather unpleasantly common attempt to put Unitarians outside of their own camp. We have got fairly used to being put outside of the evangelical, or even the so-called "Christian" camp, but we must make a stand against being put outside of our own.

The honest truth is, that what is called "The New Theology" is, in the main, good old Unitarianism, say what they like. Personally, I have not been caring much for the word, but I confess that I am being drawn to it, if only for historical accuracy's sake. And, beyond that, something is due to a fine old campaigner like Unitarianism which has "borne the heat and the burden of the day," and whose savings are being annexed by new comers who have not the grace to thank her—who even try to turn her out at the back door. The poorest little bit of chivalry is sufficient to bring any cooling Unitarian back.

THE EDUCATION BILL AND THE LORDS.

SIR,—The leader in last week's INQUIRER, headed, "Mr. Birrell's Reply," seems to me somewhat vitiated by the point of view taken up by the writer; it is the point of view of the Liberal politician rather than the Liberal educationist. The great object and desire of the latter should be to get the religious question settled and out of the way. This can only be done if a spirit of compromise is encouraged on all sides. Neither Mr. Birrell's speech nor your article will, I fear, be very helpful in this direction.

The writer of the article contends that the amendments made by the Peers to the Bill impair the force of local authority, and puts this forward as a main argument against the bill as amended. This surely shows a want of proportion, and suggests that the argument against some of the Peers' amendments are, at any rate, not very strong. In this connection he complains of the frequent introduction of "shall" for "may"; but is there not a good reason for this? The Bill, if it is to be a lasting settlement, must be a fair compromise equitable to both parties; "shall" hand over schools, on the one hand, and "may" take them, on the other, is, on the face of it, one-sided. It must be remembered that Mr. Birrell, when he introduced his Bill, laid great stress on the fact that under his Act all schools would become provided schools, or cease to be supported by grants from the State. Is it right that a local body should have the right to refuse to take over all voluntary schools, whether suitable as to buildings or not? Are all public bodies so fair minded and free from political bias that they could be safely trusted in a matter of this sort? Is it not important that such a question as this should be settled once for all, and not made the sport of municipal and other local elections?

The writer refers to the democratic spirit, and affirms what he calls "Mr. Birrell's vigorous protest against the whole procedure involved in the constitution and practice of the Upper House." This is all very well, but the House of Lords is as much part of the Constitution of the country as the King or the House of Commons. To raise seriously the constitutional question is to adjourn the settlement of the education question indefinitely. Surely this is not practical politics from an educationist's point of view.

I do not gather that the writer of the article will be seriously disappointed should the Bill be lost. He would probably consider it the lesser of two evils. From the special Unitarian point of view there would be no reason to disturb ourselves. A fallacy underlies the whole Bill; it consists in the idea that there is such a thing as undenominational religion; certainly the so-called Cowper-Temple religion as taught in the ordinary provided school is acceptable to no one but the Protestant Dissenter and the extreme low Churchman. Why should this form of religion be alone privileged and taken under the ægis of the State? Why should Unitarians give a helping hand to forward such an injustice? Surely the only reason why some of us are prepared to do so is that we are more liberal than logical. It is better, according to my view, that the Bill should be lost, if it is found impossible to render it generally acceptable. To force it through in opposition to the wishes of large sections of the people would answer no wise end. It would conclude no controversy; but would emphasise differences. A short Bill next Session dealing with the admitted hardships of 1902 Act would be another matter, and could hardly be resisted by the House of Lords. Education would not suffer by the delay; and some means might be found for easing the conscience of the passive resister in the meanwhile.

B. DOWSON.

Nottingham, Nov. 18, 1906.

[We cordially welcome Mr. B. Dowson's criticisms, which represent a point of view worthy of all respect. Many of our readers, however, will, we believe, sympathise fully with our main contentions rather than with the position he appears to support. The administration of our laws is admittedly a problem of the most serious kind, and the suggestion, but too well founded, that public bodies sometimes act unfairly, surely points in the direction of attracting the best possible local talent to serve on these bodies, and not of constricting the areas open to local knowledge and initiative spirit. Pace our correspondent, we think the position and action of the House of Lords is really a practical question for educationists as well as for other persons interested in public progress. And it seems to us that Mr. Dowson, like many in whom the oversight might be more reasonably expected, has failed to appreciate what seems to us the extreme lengths of compromise embodied in Mr. Birrell's Bill. As regards "Cowper-Temple" religious teaching, we are as little enamoured of it as Mr. Dowson is; but the "practical" mood which he seems to desiderate as regards the question of the House of Lords must surely be brought in here. As soon as the bulk of the people approve the so-called "secular solution," the way will be open to what, in this connection, Mr. Dowson seeks, viz., a "logical" policy; at present, with him, we must be prepared for compromises and adjustments; but, in our opinion, Mr. Birrell's policy is far in advance of that embodied in the Acts of 1902 and 1903, and we think that, if it is rejected, the next stage in the evolution of a truly national system will be considerably less tender towards those who wish to secure public funds for private ends.—ED. INQ.]

COAL MINING PROFITS.

SIR,—I do not know whether your readers will wish to see any further correspondence on this subject, but a final word from me seems called for. The figures I gave in my last letter to you were definitely ascertained values at which South Lancashire coal was and had been selling, not for a small percentage of the output, but for the large part which goes for household use, for gasworks, and for the supply of steamers. There remains the furnace coal for inland works, and then what is the percentage of output which is going to bring down the average? The official data furnished by Mr. Simon do not pretend to give the sale results less expenses; they give, as stated, the declared value at the pit mouth. I can assure Mr. Simon that in a great many instances which came before our Guild of Help at Swinton there were no other members of the family able to aid except to a very small extent the meagre wages of the "pit-brow" man. But is this to be the recognised rule with employers, that in considering the wages they will pay, they are to take into account what other members of the family are being paid?

This kind of thing is justified when out-door relief from the rates is under consideration, but it is quite inadmissible when considering the question of the value of a man's work as between his employer and himself.

It is suggested that a man would soon migrate if unable to obtain more than 16s. 8d. per week. What is he to migrate with? What chance has he of saving any reserve which he could use in this way? How is he to ascertain whether he could improve his position if he did? He is generally bound by the very conditions of the case to take what he can from the unskilled work of the neighbourhood.

It is begging the question to talk about paying these men more than they "earn." If it had been found possible to organise these unskilled labourers into a trade union, and to protect them for a few months from the competition of casual unskilled labour, they would be "earning" 4s. 6d. per day quite as easily as they now earn 3s. 4d.

Mr. Armstrong thinks I bring an "astounding indictment" against the employer in this case. I am glad he thinks so. He will admit, however, that the indictment is strongest against the idea that human labour, that is human life, can be justifiably purchased at the lowest possible rate at which it can be obtained. The moral responsibility upon the employer, who engages the "life" of a human being, as to the kind of life he renders possible by his remuneration for it, cannot be shaken off, be its effects astounding or otherwise.

But if my indictment of certain employers is astounding, what am I to say of Mr. Simon's indictment of Nature or God in Nature? Only this, that if I believed his argument I must go a step further, and deny the existence of a God at all, or at least of a God such as He whom, however feebly and imperfectly, I have learnt to reverence and love.

I can partially understand it, when I find reason to believe that for His own good purposes of discipline and gradual growth of character God has given free will to men, and that they are individually and collectively gradually rising to nobler and higher ideals of their relation to each other and to Him. It is for those of us who see these higher ideals to strive ever more earnestly towards their attainment:

FROM OLD TO NEW ENGLAND.

It requires a strong attraction to lure a man across the ocean away from his home and his congregation. Neither America in general, not the United States in the mass, possesses this power, but New England in particular—the New England of Plymouth and the Mayflower, of Salem and Roger Williams, of Concord and the Transcendentalists, of the “Humble Romances” of Mary Wilkins; the Boston of Channing, and Parker, and Phillips Brooks, the Cambridge of Harvard and of Dr. Crothers. Apart from these Greece or Italy offer a more inviting study.

Those who go down to the sea in ships now clamber up great leviathans. The turbine Cunarder Carmania is a modern wonder, fitly framed and knit together, compact in every joint and rivet. She is steady and silent as a mighty rock until the open Atlantic makes her “talk,” and then she is a bounding thing of life. Nearly three thousand pieces of humanity cat and sleep their way in this hotel on the sea, this floating city. The much-travelling American takes the “Ferry” quite casually. He jumps the Atlantic, romps through Europe, and then speeds back with light heart to his work: Even fogs on the Banks for ten hooting hours do not damp his exuberant spirits. “Have you been away long?” “Why, yes, five weeks, and I saw six countries.” All other lands are gaily used as holiday dependencies of the United States. The American child on board is a New Yorker indeed, who thinks the height of bliss is to walk down Fifth-avenue on Sundays, wearing new clothes. She is ten years of age, has crossed the Atlantic sixteen times, and “one time struck a storm.” The emigrants are sadly interesting; only a Stevenson could describe them: What does the steerage think of the first-class deck!

If you are obliged to reach the States in the summer months, do not choose the third week in August. To lie outside Sandy Hook through a long, limp, sweltering night, and then crawl up the harbour through a humid, sultry, heat vapour does not produce a proper or appreciative temper. Fiery torments are reserved not alone for the wicked, but also to try the vocabulary of the good!

The first sight of New York has a startling effect, and baffles the judgment. Is it garish and grotesque, or is it imposing and marvellous? It is, in any case, unmatched by any other place: The huge grain elevators and the mountainous skyscrapers, the colossal statue of Liberty, and the wondrous Brooklyn Bridge alone give this interesting scene an incomparable character of its own, and a second view is more favourable than the first one. New York, like other capitals, is a city of awful contrasts—the “Up Town” end of Fifth-avenue, with its prodigious wealth and luxury, the “Down Town” foreign “Bowery,” with its utter squalor and heart-aching poverty; the Central Park, with its secluded and uncrowded quiet, Ellis Island with its hundred thousand homeless emigrants per month! The noise of New York is terrific. Do not expect to get any sleep near Madison-square, where Broadway, Fifth-avenue, and Twenty-third-street intersect, and keep up their deafening riot throughout the day and night alike. But it is possible, of course, to find partial stillness, and a quiet afternoon in the fine Art Museum well repays the time. New York should be seen by even the uncommercial traveller, but not in hot weather.

The Fall River steamer is a gorgeous creature, with a beam engine high in the air, three decks like the stories of a house, berth accommodation for several hundred persons, and saloons of spacious size. Leaving New York Harbour at six in the evening, it reaches its destination by seven next morning. A short run by train brings one to New Bedford, once an old whaling town, but now given to cotton spinning, and a fine bridge across the river connects it with Fairhaven. Fairhaven well deserves its name, for it is a peaceful, restful little town, with just the shady street avenues and the trim unfenced gardens and the balconied wood houses which one’s fancy had pictured in New England. The finest building in the place, the tower of which can be seen for miles, is the handsome Gothic church built by Mr. Rogers, the millionaire, in memory of his daughter. The exterior is very imposing, and there is much lavish symbolism within the building, but better still is the fine congregation which entirely fills this house of meeting and enjoys the earnest ministrations of the Rev. F. L. Phalen. Hearty congregational singing, which in our New England churches is too uncommon, makes the services a fervent delight both to pew and pulpit. The church house and the minister’s manse complete the memorial buildings. The former is an embodied ideal of what such an institution may be; in the latter Mr. and Mrs. Phalen dispense most kindly hospitality. Happy is the Englishman who there is taken in and admitted to the comforts of the special guest-room. If he has ever said that the American does not know the real meaning of home, he will not be able to say it again. In the warmth of friendly welcome and the flow of common feeling, the estranging ocean is forgotten and the barriers of nation are in vain. Old England and New England are one.

THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE.

WET lanes,
And the golden splendour of leaves,
Burning through gradual rains.
Beeches afire with the glory of God,
Bracken red-brown 'gainst the green of the sod;
Symbols of hope for the heart that believes,
Found in dead leaves!

Who that hath trust can bewail
Blossoms that perish, and odours that fail, Caught with this rapture of woodlands aglow?

Autumn at last, as the summer shall go;
Winter shall cast his sharp spear—even so!
Beauty is born of the passion of strife,—
Lo, this is life!

Life in the ashes of fires that burn down,
Life in the garlands of crimson and brown;
Life in the tempests that scourge and dis-crown,
Life for the soul where'er beauty may be,
Ev'n to the uttermost parts of the sea.

LAURA ACKROYD.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HERE are two parables, the first from Bishop Latimer's fifth sermon on the Lord's Prayer, teaching humility, the other from Bishop Jeremy Taylor's “Liberty of Prophesying,” teaching charity.

(1) “I read once a story of a holy man (some say it was St. Anthony), which had been a long season in the wilderness, neither eating nor drinking anything but bread and water; at length he thought himself so holy that there should be nobody like unto him. Therefore he desired of God to know who should be his fellow in heaven. God made him answer, and commanded him to go to Alexandria; there he should find a cobbler which should be his fellow in heaven. Now he went thither and sought him out, and fell in acquaintance with him, and tarried with him three or four days to see his conversation. In the morning his wife and he prayed together; then they went to their business, he in his shop, and she about her housewifery. At dinner time they had bread and cheese, wherewith they were well content, and took it thankfully. Their children were well taught to fear God, and to say their Pater-noster (the Lord's Prayer), and the Creed, and the Ten Commandments; and so he spent his time in doing his duty truly. I warrant you, he did not so many false stitches as cobblers do now-a-days. St. Anthony, perceiving that, came to knowledge of himself, and laid away all pride and presumption. By this ensample you may learn, that honest conversation and godly living is much regarded before God; in so much that this poor cobbler, doing his duty diligently, was made St. Anthony's fellow.”

(2) “When Abraham sat at his tent door, according to his custom, waiting to entertain strangers, he espied an old man, stooping and leaning on his staff, weary with age and travel, coming towards him, who was a hundred years of age. He received him kindly, washed his feet, provided supper, caused him to sit down; but observing that the old man ate and prayed not, nor begged a blessing on his meat, he asked him why he did not worship the God of heaven. The old man told him that he worshipped the fire only, and acknowledged no other God. At which answer Abraham grew so zealously angry that he thrust the old man out of his tent, and exposed him to all the evils of the night in an unguarded condition. When the old man was gone, God called to Abraham and asked him where the stranger was? He replied, ‘I thrust him away because he did not worship Thee.’ God answered him: ‘I have suffered him these hundred years, although he dishonoured me: and could'st not thou endure him one night?’ Upon this, saith the story, Abraham fetched him back again, and gave him hospitable entertainment, and wise instruction.”

Those are both old stories, told, the first in 1552, the other in 1647. You will see that it is old English, like our English Bible of 1611. Though some of the words are difficult, I think you will see quite clearly the true lesson of both stories. Certainly Abraham would have been more likely to lead the old man, who was a fire-worshipper, to be thankful to God and to worship Him, by being kind than by driving him away.

A VETERAN'S PRAISE.

ON Thursday, November 15, as we briefly noted last week, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal happily celebrated his eightieth birthday. The presentation of addresses of congratulation and warm tribute to him on that day is here recorded. The Manchester Guardian, in introducing its excellent report of the birthday celebration, says: "No one has been associated more closely with social, ethical, and philanthropic movements in Manchester during the last nearly half a century than Mr. Steinthal. It is true that in recent times his labours have been less abundant than they used to be, but age has in no way withered his spirit. The attainment of 80 years gave his many friends and admirers an opportunity, which they gladly seized, of making open manifestation of their regard for him." We are very glad to be able to publish here in full not only the addresses from the members of the Provincial Assembly and the Widows' Fund, but also the most interesting response which Mr. Steinthal made. The other speeches on that occasion bear witness to the warmth of the affection and high regard in which he is held, and this feeling is by no means confined to Lancashire and Cheshire. Mr. Steinthal, it will be remembered, was one of the first secretaries of the National Conference. He preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1873, and in 1880 was Chairman of the Sunday School Association, at the annual meetings of which he represented his district, both in 1851 and again, after fifty years, in 1901. In 1851 he was still a student of Manchester New College, then in Manchester. For the past three years he has been President of the College, now at Oxford, and at the annual meeting in January, when he will lay down that office, the Trustees will have an opportunity of paying their own tribute to his worth. We are thankful for such occasions of saying to a veteran in the evening of a life of faithful service something of what is felt of honour and gratitude, and of quiet, happy faith for the time to come.

THE REV. S. A. STEINTHAL'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY.

THE PRESENTATION OF ADDRESSES.

At the early hour of eleven on Thursday morning, November 15, the Memorial Hall, at Manchester, was well filled by an audience which had come from all parts of Lancashire and Cheshire, and which included friends who had come as far as the Rev. G. Hamilton Vance, from Dublin, and the Rev. H. W. Perris, from London. Manchester, of course, contributed the bulk of the audience, but Liverpool was also well represented. Such a gathering was a splendid testimony to the part Mr. Steinthal has played in the fellowship of our churches and in the religious and educational life of the two counties.

The President of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, occupied the chair, and the senior secretary of the Assembly, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, proceeded at once to read many letters of apology and regret from those unable to attend. Sir I. T. Shann, late Lord Mayor of Manchester, was one of those who sent his word of testimony to the honourable part played by Mr. Steinthal in the public life of the city.

The CHAIRMAN said they were gathered to show how deeply they appreciated and admired Mr. Steinthal's valuable services to the churches and to many good causes dear to their hearts. He first knew Mr. Steinthal when he was a Mission minister in Liverpool, and learnt from him his first enthusiasm for the cause of temperance and social reform. Coming recently to settle in Manchester he found Mr. Steinthal still untiringly at work at the old causes, giving his advocacy and help to the cause of education, peace, national righteousness in all its forms, the care of the destitute and afflicted.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson then read the Address from the Provincial Assembly.

ADDRESS FROM THE MEMBERS OF THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

MANCHESTER, Nov. 15, 1906.

DEAR MR. STEINTHAL,—We, the undersigned, desire to convey to you our heartfelt congratulations on your completion of four score years of a life that will be always held dear throughout the Province in which you commenced your beneficent labours half a century ago. Having previously occupied the pulpit at Bridgwater, you first entered the Province in 1857 as Minister to the Poor at Liverpool; after five years in that noble Christian service passing, in 1864, with brief interval, to your ministry at Platt Chapel; leaving it in 1870 to become minister at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester; and retiring in 1893, only to continue to this hour your service of God and man, with an industry that has never tired, and a zeal that has known no abatement.

It is impossible to enumerate all the honourable positions which you have filled in the Province during your long residence within it. No minister on the Roll of its preachers and presidents will be held in more honour than yourself, none have rendered more faithful service on its General, Special, and Advisory Committees; while as the senior member of the Committee of the Widows' Fund so closely associated with it and as one of the Trustees of the Fund, holding successively for long years the posts of Vice-President and President, and still occupying its chair amid the ever-growing confidence and affection of its members, you have conferred benefits upon them second to none recorded in its history. To Manchester New College, at Manchester and in London, and to the same beloved alma mater in its new home at Oxford, as Trustee since 1853, as senior member of the Committee, as its Chairman, and as Visitor, for years, and as President at this day, your service has been of rare duration and constancy in its devoted labour. Of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board you were also a supporter.

You have been a foremost worker, in and around Manchester, in the District and Domestic Missionary Associations, giving to the latter the loving devotion which inspired you in your first post in the Province. You have been a zealous supporter of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, occupying its Presidential Chair, and your ministry has been marked by your devoted work in connection with the Lower Mosley-street schools. In all your religious activity in our midst you have ever been one of the truest custodians of our vital principle of freedom in search for the truth of God, and of breadth of sympathy with all who worship the universal Father with fidelity.

But one of the distinguishing marks of your noble Christian life has been your indefatigable social service as a citizen of Manchester, taking a leading place in support of every philanthropic cause, an embodiment of true public spirit, advancing the sum of human good, inspired with the enthusiasm of humanity, and bringing nearer the kingdom of God on earth by labours on behalf of Education, of Temperance, of the Emancipation of Women, of Social Amelioration in every form, and of relief of sickness and suffering in beneficent institutions born of the spirit of the Master whom you have so truly served.

Those of us who are your brother ministers look up to you as our leader, and we all, ministers and people alike, regard you with a reverent affection beyond expression; we hold your name in honour; your sweet Christian character is to all of us an inspiring example; your loyalty to truth and your devotion to principle call us to like faithfulness while life lasts, and we pray that you may still have years before you to serve God and man, surrounded by our ever-growing love.

The Address had been beautifully illuminated and bound in book form, and it was signed by over 200 ministers and members of the Assembly. Mr. Dowson added a few words after the reading of the Address. He had known Mr. Steinthal, he said, for 45 years. All that time he had been his leader, inspirer, exemplar, and friend. He had been an example to all in his combination of a large public service with an unswerving devotion to pastoral duties.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING said it was always difficult for Englishmen to break through their natural reserve, and to make a true emotion into a public sympathy: But they would be untrue if they did not now express their feelings to one who had long been to them as their bishop, chosen not by any external authority, or Parliamentary agency, but chosen by their love and reverence.

Mr. JAMES R. BEARD, on behalf of the lay members of the Assembly, said Mr. Steinthal had carried on the tradition of Unitarian devotion to public service in a noble manner. He had always shown quick sympathy with sorrow and suffering. His name would always be associated with the Children's Hospital, and with the efforts made to help the feeble minded. Manchester had always been in the front in education, and no one had helped it more to that position during the past fifty years than Mr. Steinthal. Indeed, every good cause had sought the help of his advocacy, and never in vain, and, while they rejoiced in this record of his work, they rejoiced still more in his fine Christian character equalled by few and excelled by none. "And so his birthday finds him to-day surrounded, as old age should be, by honour, love, obedience, and troops of friends."

Mr. JOHN DENDY said Mr. Steinthal's life was an object-lesson in that most difficult art, the art of growing old wisely.

The Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON read the address from the Widows' Fund.

ADDRESS FROM THE MEMBERS OF THE WIDOWS' FUND.

MANCHESTER, Nov. 15, 1906.

DEAR MR. STEINTHAL,—We, the undersigned members and officers of the Widows' Fund, desire to join in the congratulations extended to you on your eightieth birthday, on which they rejoice to greet you still in possession of vigour of body and mind, and devoting it to the beneficent labours in which your life has been spent.

Entering the Fund in 1867, you have been a member of the Committee since 1868, a Trustee since 1874, an Auditor 1875-7, Vice-President, 1880-8, and President since 1888; and you have rendered services to us, your brethren in the ministry enrolled in its ranks, for which your gratitude is beyond expression. In the later years of your connection with the Fund, during which you have taken the most influential place in its counsels, it has passed through a crisis demanding from its members, and especially from one holding your responsible position, all the best thought and maturest judgment that could be given to it, combined with allegiance in all to a spirit of self-abnegation for the common good. That the Fund has come out of the trial financially sound, owing to reductions in its benefits made by the members without dissentient voice, is largely due to your example. We have had, in your own clear apprehension of the situation, not only in its broader aspects, but in its more detailed circumstances, a guidance which we have followed with implicit trust, while you have exercised a persuasive power due to your sympathetic entrance into the anxieties of those from whom sacrifices were asked.

It is difficult for us to find words to tell you as we would of the joy which your continued presence in the Chair gives us on your thus attaining the age of fourscore years, still in full possession of the noble powers which you have devoted so abundantly to our service.

That you may yet be spared, under the blessing of the Heavenly Father of us all, to lead our deliberations as the beloved elder brother in our midst, to whom we look up with a reverent affection that grows with each added year, is our earnest prayer.

This address, also, was richly illuminated and bound in book form. It was signed by every member of the Fund.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH presented a resolution from the Committee of the Manchester Domestic Mission, and Col. Pilcher read an address from the Lower Mosley-street schools, which, it is understood, will be engrossed and presented later on. Mr. Steinthal then replied, and the meeting closed with his word of benediction:

MR. STEINTHAL'S REPLY.

It is no easy task that lies before me this morning. I cannot say that I am afraid when I have to speak in public, but I know I cannot thank you as I ought to do for your kindness, and I trust that you will forgive me if I read my reply, lest I should find words fail if I trusted to unwritten utterance.

You have given me credit for services the value of which you have over-estimated, judging me by your generous sympathy instead of by actual desert. No one can know as I do how often I have failed to do what I ought to have done, and done what I ought not to have done. But your addresses have given me assurance that you have always recognised my wish to serve, even when I have only tried, but could not achieve. I wish I could find words to thank you fitly. When I shall have forgotten the painful sense of unworthiness, as one does forget the pain which so often accompanies undeserved praise, I shall not forget your kindness, shown not for the first time to-day, but proved in hours gone by of real trial, and not by words alone, but by kind and practical deeds of self-sacrifice and sympathy.

In preparing the address of the Provincial Assembly the writer must evidently have searched minute books and old records, going back more than half a century to when I left Manchester New College to enter my first settlement in Bridgwater. My own remembrance of the Assembly goes back further than the date you recall, for I remember its meetings before I was privileged to be one of its members. It was a different body, and its meetings were different from what they are to-day. I have seen important changes in its constitution, and in its name and usages.

When I first attended one of its meetings, its members were ministers only, though all sorts and conditions of men were permitted to attend and take part in its discussions. The so-called business meeting was generally a somewhat dry and formal proceeding. It was only on rare occasions that subjects were discussed which aroused any warmth of feeling. The chief event of the gathering was the religious service, where the chosen preacher gave to his colleagues and the congregation assembled with them, his message concerning things divine, on which he had been anxiously and devoutly meditating, looking forward with more or less of awe and expectation for two years to the day on which he should have this one opportunity of speaking to his brethren, as the Assembly's chosen preacher.

When the service and the business meeting were over, the members of the Assembly with some of the leading men of the congregation dined together. They were very pleasant gatherings, and not without spiritual value as well as social charm, as you can well imagine, when you remember what names there stood upon the roll of ministers. There was the venerable William Turner, who had celebrated his ministerial jubilee in Newcastle, and spent the close of his honoured days amongst us in Manchester, and on the same roll his son-in-law, John Gooch Robberds, whom some few here will remember, his colleague William Gaskell, Dr. Beard of Strangeways, and most honoured and beloved John James Tayler. Liverpool sent James Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, and John Robberds. There were giants among us in those days. And from other chapels came men not all equal in theological eminence and scholarly refinement, but not a few able to stand on a line of high attainment, and all with earnest religious zeal and Christian spirit that had gained the reverence and affection of all who knew them. I wonder how many remember Whitehead of Cockey Moor, Baker of Bolton, Henry Green of Knutsford, Ragland of Hindley, Francis Knowles of Park-lane, Brook Aspland of Dukinfield, Colston of Styall, Philip Carpenter of Stand, afterwards of Warrington. I could name other saintly souls whom it was a privilege to know and still is a joy to remember. And then what names do not rise to one's mind of laymen, in whose help the meetings were glad. There were the brothers William and Richard Rathbone, George Holt, Thomas Bolton, and other noble leaders in all good works in Liverpool, Mark and Robert Philips, Robert Hyde and Samuel Greg, Samuel Dukinfield, Darbshire, James Aspinall Turner, the Shawcrosses, Potters, and Woods of Manchester, the Grundys and Wrigleys from Bury, Thomas Ashton of Hyde, Worthington of Sale, Naylor of Altrincham, and many others whose broad liberal principles and cultivated intelligence made these meetings rich in noble suggestion and high purpose. How we do miss these cherished pillars of our old liberal Non-conformity!

Looking back is now and then sad, when it recalls the memory of those whose places cannot be filled, though when each year our Annual Assembly meets we find new reason to be grateful that we have still such faithful leaders, by different methods, and new plans to guide our onward progress towards religion, truth, and freedom.

You have kindly named other societies as agencies in which, during the passing years, I have been allowed to work with many of you. It is hard to say in which I have been most deeply interested. We ministers have perhaps been most closely brought together in the Widows' Fund, whose early record it is not easy to separate from the history of the Assembly. You who are members of the Fund have presented me with an address which I shall treasure while life is given me. It greatly over-rates my work for the Fund, but it is welcome to me as a proof of your recognition that I have tried to be of use to my brother ministers, and it gives me the satisfaction of knowing that I have not altogether failed, while it is a real joy to know that when I meet a member of the Fund, I am sure to grasp the hand of someone on whose friendship I can rely.

With the older members I have passed through trying times. I never think of those dark days without gratitude to God, that I have been so closely associated with such an unselfish brotherhood. They sacrificed their personal interests, that they might secure as much as possible of the benefits which the Fund could bestow for those who would follow them in the ministry, and did so with such self-denial, that when the plan was spoken of to the actuary whom we consulted, his calm, business-like judgment declared that it could not be expected from any set of men. I am not going to enter upon theological controversy to-day, but I must say that in the reconstitution of the Widows' Fund, I learned to know where I could find men who loved their neighbours as themselves, and had proof that the mind which lived in Jesus is alive amongst us still, and that, in the hearts of men who minister to our congregations. There were some of the brethren, who not only gave this love, but whose clear intelligence was given to the renewal of the Fund on a sound basis, whose help we and our successors ought never to forget. Those who shared the work of those days will never forget George Beaumont and Russell Carpenter, who have been called unto their rest, or the thoughtful service of our venerable friend, who still, with his bright intelligence and loving spirit, makes us rejoice in his green old age, and thankfully remember his many efforts to secure the Fund, our senior J. K. Montgomery. With him our generous secretary, who suggested the principles on which the Fund now acts, and did so much to remove our fears for its future safety. I cannot speak of the Widows' Fund without acknowledging the debt we owe to my old friend Robert D. Darbishire, for the many services he rendered as our treasurer, and of the unnumbered services he has rendered so unobtrusively, but munificently, glorifying the heavenly Father, and helping his brother men.

In the address from the Provincial Assembly, my dear old College, with which in various ways I have been connected for fifty years and more, is named. How can I tell what I owe to my old tutors, and to the trustees and the friends of the College? How repay the debt I owe to Kenrick, Tayler, Martineau, Gaskell, Vance Smith, at whose feet I sat, or become worthy of the honour which my co-trustees have conferred upon me? May I be allowed with grateful remembrance to recall my fellow students of those distant days, and trust that the two or three who are living still will for "Auld Lang Syne," if for no other reason, share somewhat of the emotion which fills my heart to-day.

I said when I began I could not thank you as I ought. Most deeply does this impress me when I consider the warm personal affection which breathes in the address of my friends of the Lower Mosley-street Schools. I recall the time when I was privileged to work in the old buildings, which I remember from their beginning, with Curtis and Travers Madge with Craven, Charles and Brooke Herford, Richard Pilcher, Birch, Salkeld, Ogden, who with others have entered into their rest, and with some of you who, like myself, are left to think of them, and the high example which they set us. To have known them and those whose kindly greetings you have given me to-day, more than repays anything one could do for the school. It is a pleasure to be allowed still to share in the constantly varying activities of those who are continuing the good work of the olden days. I look forward to meeting the school before long in its own home, and spending a pleasant hour with its members and friends.

Ladies and gentlemen of the Domestic Mission, you also have been so kind as to think of me and my long connection with the society which you represent. I am not able now to work as actively with you as in former days, but I feel as deeply as ever I have done, that there is no more Christian work than that you are striving to do. Among my earliest recollections I recall how my father used to speak of the Mission, then in its early years, praising its broad unsectarian character and its efficiency. I trust it may be carried on in the same spirit and with growing power for many years to come. I thank you for your kind acknowledgment of my endeavours to help your work, and share your hopes of growing usefulness.

You have been good enough to speak of other institutions and to name me in connection with them. Can any one fail to be glad in being allowed to work for the sacred objects they promote; the diffusion of the highest truths the soul can grasp, the endeavour to make the spirit of Jesus the source of life among men, preserving the purity of childhood's faith and love, expanding and cultivating the powers and grace of youth, and helping to build up with living stones the Kingdom of our Father, the Universal Church of God?

To me that Kingdom and that Church have no limit either in ritual or in creed. Wherever there are men, it is our duty and should be our joy to consecrate ourselves to make known God's holy will, and the mind that was in Christ Jesus. You remind me, that holding this faith, I have not kept aloof from social, municipal, or political work, taking some part in combating intemperance, licentiousness, and all the many evils which mar the beauty of God's world, in which His children should be able to dwell in righteousness and peace. The movements, in which I have been allowed to share, have not always been popular. I am eighty years old to-day, and can therefore recollect how we teetotalers were laughed at and abused even in the middle of the last century, and how few was the number of those who claimed for women equal social and political rights with men, or who maintained that there must be an equal standard in judging the deeds of both the sexes. I wonder whether I shall live to see right done in these questions for which I have worked many years? I have not very great hope that in any questions that touch morality and righteousness between human beings or our dumb fellow creatures we can expect efficient laws till men are wise and just enough to call to their full help those gifts and faculties with which nature has marked the differences of men and women, and which united make the fulness of humanity.

I hope I have not wearied you with my thanks to you. After all, no words can tell what I feel for the kindness you have shown me so generously to-day. May the blessing of our heavenly Father rest upon you. As long as He still grants me life I shall remember your overflowing goodness, and pray that I may become more worthy of your rich sympathy and regard.

ADVENT ADDRESSES.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.,
I.—THE GREEK.

"I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians. . . And, as much as in me lies, I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also. For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth, to the Jew first and also to the Greek."—Rom. i. 14-16.

TO-DAY is the first Sunday in Advent, the season that prepares us for Christmas, and I want to speak on this and the following Sundays of the different religions immediately preceding and contemporary with and in close contact with Christianity. To understand what the Gospel is, and what it has done, and why it has done it, it is well sometimes to look at the forms of faith it superseded and, in turn, was influenced by. St. Paul declares that Christianity is salvation to the Jew, the Greek, and the Barbarian, and that he is ready to preach it to the Roman also as a precious and indispensable treasure. What kind of a religion was embraced respectively by the Greek, the Roman, the Barbarian, and the Jew, and how Christianity differed from each and was affected by each, is an interesting study, and of great practical consequence.

I will begin with the Greek.

No great people has been without a religion, least of all the Greeks. They were, of course, a highly gifted race—in many respects the most gifted race the world has ever seen. They were a clever, subtle, artistic nation, a nation with a genius for philosophy and art. Their metaphysics, their rhetoric, their drama, their architecture and sculpture, their refined taste in everything affecting their senses, and last, but not least, their language, are in their way supreme. We gather up the remaining fragments of these glorious things with amazement and confess that they are unique. There have been other philosophies, oratorios, dramas, architectures, sculptures and languages, nobler in some respects than theirs, but markedly different, and lacking their peculiar grace and charm. And the Greek religion partook of this national genius. Among the educated it was philosophic, a worship of reason. The universe was recognised to be a universe, a kosmos, a realm of creative intelligence, and God was the divine thought pervading it. The spirit of knowledge was conceived as immanent within and transcending—at any rate by Plato—the entire visible realm of things, like a rare ether. St. Paul, in his famous sermon on Mars Hill at Athens, appealed to the Greek mind and spoke, consciously, or unconsciously, in the Greek pantheistic manner, when he said of God, "He is not far from any one of us; for in Him we live and move and have our being." Another feature of the Greek religion, characteristic both of the æstheticism of the cultivated and the popular anthropomorphism—also reflected in St. Paul's great sermon—was the worship of the beautiful. The most pleasing manifestations of the creative mind, in the eyes of the Greek, were the gods and goddesses that dwelt in the poetry of the educated and the people's faith, beings physically lovely, in the enjoyment of perfect health, undisturbed by sickness or earth, in possession of immortal happiness. Such was the Grecian ideal projected into the heavens. Zeus, Athene, Venus and Apollo were realities to the multitude, and hardly less real as ideas of perfection to the philosopher. And in accord with this ideal was the service of the temple—a blending of beautiful symbol and ceremony and music, associated frequently with beautiful architecture and landscape. Mars Hill, on which St. Paul stood that day, overlooked the city, with its halls, and theatres and gardens, and, beyond, the Piræus, the port of Athens, and again beyond, the blue Ægean; while behind him rose the splendid temple of the goddess of Reason, a mass of richly-coloured marble glowing and flashing in the blue sky. We ought to recall this picture in order to realise the full significance of the words: "God that made the world and all things therein, dwelleth not in temples made with hands"; and "forasmuch as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold or silver or stone graven by art and man's device."

Now, it was natural that this religion of reason and beauty should affect Christianity. It did affect it, and in a powerful way. The influence of Greek philosophy had already shown itself in the Old Testament, as, for example, in the ninth chapter (on Wisdom) of the Book of Proverbs, and in the Book of Ecclesiastes. The Old Testament had been translated into Greek, and a school of Jewish philosophers, including the Platonist Philo, had sprung up. Greek was practically the universal language of the then known world, and community of language necessarily involves some community of thought. The New Testament records are preserved in Greek, and show many points of contact with Alexandria, Ephesus, Corinth, and Athens. St. Paul professed to despise philosophy, declared he would have nothing to do with it; but in addressing Greek audiences he inevitably fell into philosophic modes of thought. His speeches at Lystra and, as I have said, at Athens are instances of this. He alleges God's method with men, men, and alleges it as a proof. He does not merely dogmatise, as the Hebrew prophets do with their "Thus saith the Lord." And at Athens he quotes a Greek poet, Aratus, in support of his contention that man is God's child. He found the Greeks ready to accept his doctrine of the Son of God. It was, in a mythical form, familiar to them. He uses expressions borrowed from the philosophers—significant and valuable terms such as "Nature," "Reason," and "Conscience." And his practical wisdom appears in the manner in which he utilised the Greek guilds and fraternities, changing them from discussion societies into assemblies for prayer and centres of brotherly and social service—in fact, into congregations. The Fourth Gospel also, in a remarkable way, shows Greek influence. The doctrine of Christ as the Word or logos is due to Plato through Philo or some other follower. In St. John's Gospel, too, Christ is identified with the Truth. Evidently the writer sought to recommend him to readers who required that he and his teaching should have the sanction of logic and reason and intellectual fact. Nor can we doubt that Christianity gained by its transference from Judaic to Greek soil. It passed out of the narrow limits of national and rabbinical controversy, in which the Græco-Roman world could feel no interest, into the larger field of human salvation and redemption.

In the same manner—though I have not time to dwell upon this—the Gospel was influenced by Greek art. The puritan spirit of Judaism, which despised temples and images, gradually died out of the Church—to be revived in after ages—and temples became cathedrals, and statues crucifixes and the figures of Madonnas and saints. The transition is easy from the ceremonies and mysteries of the Greek religion to those of the Catholic Church.

Nevertheless, Christianity emphatically triumphed over the Greek faith. Plato had no chance against St. Paul. Socrates yielded speedily to Christ. And for the following reasons:—

In the first place, the Greek, as a rule—and, of course, there were many exceptions—was restless and unstable. We read in the Book of Acts that "the Athenians spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing." So they appeared to St. Paul and his companions, and must, to a great extent, be judged by us. The Greek loved novelty. Variety caught his attention and distracted him. He rushed from subject to subject, went off at a tangent, dissipated his admiration and enthusiasm. He wanted self-control, concentration—I am speaking, of course, in general terms, and do not forget the enormous concentration needed for a dialogue of Plato or a masterpiece of Phidias—the power of calm and changeless principle. He lacked repose and the strength which comes of repose. Hence the Greek was overcome by the Roman. Quick, sensitive faculty was no match for steady, solid purpose.

In the next place, Christianity gave a revelation instead of a philosophy. The difference is fundamental. From the beginning the Gospel has been a revelation and not a mere philosophy, and if it ever ceases to be a revelation it will cease to be Christianity. St. Paul, in being influenced by philosophy, in recognising the reasoned orderliness of God's dealings with men, instead of the old Jewish belief in His arbitrary acts and favouritism, never abandoned the prophetic and dogmatic position. He knew God, not by argument, but by intuition. He did not gradually, step by step, through a long chain of reasoning, find his way to God, but by an act of insight of the soul knew that God knew him, had made His way to him, and manifested to him His nature and His will. Here is the momentous distinction. Philosophy is man's halting path to God, the toilsome digging and engineering of the brain. Revelation is the Father's disclosure of Himself, in an instant of love and courage and prayer, to His wondering, worshipping child. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The simple, gentle, faithful, suffering spirit may have the light borne in upon it which research and learning can never attain. And therefore it is that the book of Israel, and not the book of Greece, the record of sinning and repenting, of struggling and enduring, of love and trouble and triumph, and not the record of wisdom, is the Word of God.

In the next place, the Greek was ever tempted to put culture before conscience. Duty was one of the arts. To live a good life was to live harmoniously or artistically. "Perfect" and "musical" are the same in Greek. Balance, symmetry, proportion, not righteousness, was the ideal of life. There is, no doubt, immense truth in this conception, a truth often lost sight of by the Puritans; but in itself it is incomplete. It is not a robust, stern, all-conquering faith. It is not fitted to do the hard and disagreeable work of the world. Taking life artistically is not the same as heroism. It does not produce saints and martyrs.

Consequently we find in the Greek religion an altogether inadequate sense of sin. It is astonishing how little there is of it in the poetry, drama, and philosophy of Greece. It seems to be almost absent from Homer: Ulysses breaks again and again the weightiest laws of the decalogue without a touch of shame or remorse. He sins like a babe, though he has the cunning and the resourcefulness of a master. In the Orphic discipline and the Mysteries we meet with the awakening conscience, but we look in vain in Hellenic writings for the cries of the Psalms. There is plenty of the feeling of discrepancy, of inward discord, of unreasonableness, of mental crookedness, of departure from the straight track, but little sense of what the Christian calls wickedness, repentance, self-hatred, the desire for forgiveness and reconciliation. The Greek is mortified in a lower kind of way. He is angry at his stupidity, his want of sense, the lack of good breeding in his behaviour. It troubles him that he has not been a man of taste and a gentleman, not that he is a sinner.

Consequently, also, the Greek mind—and again I speak in general terms—presents us with a shallow idea of suffering and service. Pain was inartistic and an evil. In Greek art it is nearly always treated as a blemish, as something ugly. In Greek tragedy, especially in Æschylus, you hear tones that remind you of the Hebrew prophets, but it is rarely relieved by what we know as Christian patience. To suffer is a calamity, and to be borne as a calamity. It is the fate of the unfortunate or the lot of slaves. The truth of the Cross was foolishness in the eyes of the philosophers. When St. Paul, knowing their love for disputation and false notions about pain, said to the Corinthians, though he was a scholar and a thinker and an orator, that he came "not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, but determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and him crucified," he touched their weakest spot. "You disputers," he said, in effect, "you eloquent arguers, you are trifling away your lives and those of your hearers. What you need, and they need, is not philosophy nor art, but a new spirit. Sin is your disease. You talk brilliantly of virtue, but do not practise it. You need self-sacrifice. You require something of hardship and iron in your composition. You call the death of Christ a tale of shame, suitable for bondmen and outcast wretches. I say it is for you, you polished ladies and gentlemen, for the wise, the noble, the mighty. Learn of those whom you term foolish, whom you despise, who are weak and things of nought; for the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of men."

Hence the Greeks were ready enough to let slaves do the disagreeable work of the world and themselves enjoy recreation. After a time slavery was considered a necessary feature of civilisation. In Plato's "Republic" it is calmly concluded that culture is only possible where the drudgery is done by a class of helots. Unless there were men and women doomed to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, there could not be, said the Greek philosopher, refinement, learning, art, or religion. What a horrible idea this is! Think of it—refinement, learning, art, religion depending on slavery; the highest things of life requiring the denial of these things to the poor! It is a pagan paradox, a scepticism of the worst kind, a distrust of the moral constitution of the universe. St. Paul, believing that the world was coming to an end any moment, acquiesced in social arrangements as he found them, and did not plead for manumissions in the Epistle to Philemon; but he struck at the very root of slavery in the brotherly spirit he there advocated both in master and man, in the great declaration on Mars Hill—"God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth."

Finally, because the Greeks had an inadequate sense of sin, because they would not see the truth of the Cross, because they lived for refined pleasure, and kept slaves, and looked down on their unhappy fellow-men, they had small faith in immortality. Some belief, of course, there was. The common people expected to go to Hades. Sometimes, as in Pindar, Æschylus and Plato, the faith is vivid. But on the whole it was weak, miserably weak—as it must always be when pity, justice, and self-sacrifice are wanting. Those accomplished Athenians, when St. Paul spoke of the resurrection, mocked at the saying, and put him off with, "We will hear thee again of this matter." Culture cannot bring us the deepest truths. They are born of something more universal. From love they come, from duty, from self-denial—in a word, from eternal life, life with God. Thence springs the undying conviction that He will not suffer His holy ones to see corruption.

Christianity, then, was a blessing to the Greeks. It gave them something certain to rest in—a revelation instead of a mere philosophy, one Everlasting Father instead of a distracting number of deities, fixed purposes, and principles in place of theories. It emphasised righteousness, putting it far above knowledge and beauty, convincing men that an honest and true heart was infinitely better than learning, or taste, or cleverness. It stirred up their consciences, making them feel that their falsehoods and follies were not mere delinquencies, but wickedness and death. It spread a cloud over the shallow gaieties of life, and opened a new heaven of happiness. It threw light on suffering, demonstrated that only through pain and difficulty can we build up a noble character or benefit the world. It honoured service, dignified menial tasks, set the Carpenter of Nazareth above the throne of the Emperor. And by doing all this, by bringing men into real communion with God, it deepened faith in life beyond life and destroyed the fear of death.

My friends, we are not Athenians; but some of the weaknesses of the Greeks are the weaknesses of modern life in general and ours in particular. If we are restless and distracted, let us think how calm and strong was Jesus Christ. If we do not feel as we ought the sinfulness of sin and the rightness of right, let us be refreshed and chastened by our contemplation of him. If we love ease and pleasure, let us look at the Cross. If we think meanly of lowly service and desire to lord it over others, let us remember the saying, "I came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." And, in conclusion, if we doubt the future, if we have little or no faith in immortality, if we say to ourselves, "It is too good to be true," let us consider whether we have yet discovered how good things are, how beautiful and wonderful and sacred life is, and whether if we were really Christians, if we were more like Christ and knew the blessed secret of his Cross, we might not win this crowning faith.

MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

THE fifty-fourth annual meeting was held in the vestry of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Monday, Nov. 12, Mr. J. Arthur Kenrick, president, in the chair.

The minutes of the last annual meeting, Oct. 31, 1905, having been read and confirmed, Mr. E. P. BEALE, the hon. treasurer, presented the statement of accounts, and Mr. T. H. RUSSELL, the hon. secretary, read the Directors' report. This showed that during the past year £2,099 had been expended in 47 grants, received by 24 widows, 19 ministers, and the orphan children of four former beneficiary members. In the same period two new members had been elected, 5 had died, and 2 had withdrawn; there were 197 names on the roll of beneficiary members. Of the deceased members special mention was made of the Revs. H. W. Ellis, J. Bevan, and T. Leyland. In three cases of ill-health timely and most welcome help was given to ministers, and altogether the work of the Society had been of a most satisfactory kind. Donations of £100 each from Miss Sharpe and the President, £10 from Mr. W. G. Harrison, of Croydon, and £89 13s. 4d. from the executors of the late H. J. Morton, were recorded. It was agreed to transfer £250 of the balance carried forward to the General Fund, which on Sept. 30 stood at £67,803 10s. 11d.

On the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Street, the accounts and report were adopted. Thanks were given to the officers, and they were re-elected, as were also the retiring directors, the Revs. H. Eachus, T. Pipe; and A. H. Shelley; and Messrs. H. C. Field, H. New, and R. Peyton. A cordial vote of thanks to the President brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

THAT "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin" has never been more truly demonstrated than by the sympathy shown for those who suffered through the Wingate Colliery disaster. The whole of the North of England has been saddened, and the genuine sorrow of all classes has been evidenced by the ready and generous response to the appeal (started by the Northern Echo) on behalf of the bereaved. Rich and poor, Queen and peasant—all opened their hearts and their purses to aid the widows and the orphans whose breadwinners were so suddenly taken from them. The miners' members, Mr. J. Wilson and Mr. J. Johnson, both paid a high tribute to the bravery and nobility of the miners, comparing their deeds of heroism with those of the soldier.

In October the Durham Diocesan Conference was held at Darlington, and in view of the Education Bill, this was an important gathering—indeed, it was to this Conference that many looked for a leading on the question. The Bishop of Durham pleaded with Churchmen for a Christian tone and spirit. He urged the necessity of contending "not for a party triumph, but for the high and sacred interests of the faith and the morals of the nation as a whole." Canon Scott, of Manchester, urged that religious instruction should be given by teachers on the staff, and he maintained that any form of belief, any form of Christianity, was better than none. Canon Cosgrave remarked, "If it were a choice between secularism and anything else (Bible teaching), they certainly could not have secularism." On the other hand, Rev. T. C. Gobat represented a section of the people who said that unless they had the children instructed in their own faith they would have no religious instruction at all, and added that if it were impossible to have church teaching, then "let them have secular education." This was greeted with dissent. The Bishop was evidently much perturbed, as the resolution which was proposed was intended to be as "emphatic a condemnation of secularism as they could put together." They desired no compromise, for he felt that secularism would be "an unspeakable national calamity"; and so the resolution against a "national calamity" was carried. So ended the conference, which, like Unitarian Conferences, did not find all of one mind!

The municipal elections are now over, and one cannot but be struck by the activity of "the Trade" (as it calls itself) in running their own candidates. In some of our northern towns not a few seats have been captured. When the publican's (or the ex-publican's) turn for the mayoralty comes round, we then have the anomaly of the chief magistrate having to mete out punishment to the poor victim whose misdeeds may have been due, perhaps, to the mayor's beer or whisky. Town councils, in the interests of commercial purity, are most particular, and rightly so, in prohibiting councillors from contracting for corporation work. But, to be consistent, should they not go a step further in relation to the adjudication on drunkenness by those interested in the trade? The impropriety of members of the trade being placed on "Watch Committees" has already attracted public attention in the North of England. Surely here, too, there is need for reform.

As most good things come from the north, it may be that here, too, a new career for women may be opened, so that not only in London are women advancing! A northern newspaper heads a paragraph that at the Elswick (Newcastle) works of Armstrong, Whitworth, & Co., young ladies are now employed in the drawing offices as tracers, their work being most valuable, and the "neatness quite phenomenal."

Denominationally we are in the condition of not yet having attained our ideal. The attendance at the annual meetings of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, held at Newcastle in October, fell far below that which one might naturally expect on such an occasion. The reports showed the settlement of ministers at Barnard Castle and Darlington, whilst South Shields, Sunderland, and Chipping are now without ministerial help. All honour, however, to the faithful few who hold on to the cause in times of low water—some giving lay help in the pulpit, others working assiduously in the Sunday school, and in various ways holding the fort until more help is forthcoming. It is indeed true, as the Rev. Frank Walters remarked at the public meeting, that but for the help from our lay preachers it would have been simply impossible for the services in some of our chapels to have been maintained. Nevertheless, it would be foolish to close our eyes to the fact that things are not as they should be, and might be if we were more in earnest. We are not suffering from want of organisation. We have an association, with officers able and earnest, who must often have deplored the small response to their appeals for help. Neither do we suffer from lack of opportunity for missionary effort. With practically new ground before us in large towns such as Jarrow, the Hartlepoons, and Tynemouth, with a combined population of 173,000, we cannot lull ourselves to rest, or delude ourselves that our missionary days are over.

The story of the work accomplished fifty years ago by the Society then entitled the North of England Unitarian Christian Association; as recorded in the minutes of the secretary, the revered Rev. George Harris, who was himself the force and mainspring of the association, is of thrilling interest. Would that we could have a revival of those days by a forward movement in 1907! Whilst it is true that orthodox churches have broadened, many enjoying their heterodoxy within their own borders, yet it must be remembered that this broadening is distinctly in favour of Unitarianism, and the step to the avowal of it is in many cases made comparatively easy. Does not the fault, then, lie largely with ourselves? We are not likely to attract active workers from orthodox churches if they see that Unitarians, with their glorious gospel, are themselves apathetic and indifferent to missionary effort. We often hear the question, "Why do working men not attend church?" We might justly ask, "Why do Unitarians not attend Unitarian churches?" But with an earnest laity, together with increased ministerial help, the weak and struggling churches might be made successful churches, whilst new ground could be prepared for establishing future congregations.

It is true that our educated and able laity are busy in all sorts of good works; but unless the church also claims our activities it is useless to expect that converts will be attracted to our cause.

At the annual conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association it was agreed to recommend to the churches in the district the formation of branches of the National Conference Union for Social Service. It was suggested that during the coming winter one subject at least might claim the study of the churches. Here, indeed, is a wide field for interesting and useful work. What more fitting than that the churches should try to understand the social problems of the day by study, by the collecting of facts, and by bringing into their midst specialists on various questions, and thereby help to train and fit the members to take their share as citizens and reformers. Let us not be afraid of differences of opinion. We can study and discuss social questions in a friendly spirit, giving a respectful hearing to all shades of opinion, bearing and forbearing, the object being to obtain, as was pointed out by a speaker at the recent housing reform deputation, "the greatest common measure of the opinions of all well-meaning persons on the subject." To the service of man as well as to the worship of God are our churches dedicated, and the latter, to be real, must include the former. Thus it was understood by the North of England Unitarian Association in 1851, when, at the sixth annual meeting a resolution condemning the fugitive slave law of America was carried, the Rev. George Armstrong, of Lewin's Mead, Bristol (father of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong), being the preacher.

In view of the proposed experiment in municipal housing by the Durham County Council, the question of overcrowding would form an excellent subject for study and investigation. The County Council proposes to build fifty workmen's houses at the mining village of Usworth at £200 each, the cost to be repaid by the District Council. But whatever social question we attempt to study or deal with, we shall find that, interwoven with it, are many other problems. If, for instance, we take the subject of overcrowding, we shall find that intimately connected with it is the difficult and urgent question of our land laws.

Indeed, the interdependence of most of our social problems is realised the more we look into them, and hence the paramount importance of careful and systematic study. And who so likely to help forward these reforms as the churches, and especially our Free Churches? All success, then, to the National Conference Union for Social Service!

CLARA C. LUCAS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackburn.—The services, since the formation of the Church, on Nov. 28, 1905, have been held in a room at the Exchange, but on Nov. 11 the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, preached the opening sermon in a new room in King William-street (Sudell Cross), which has been newly decorated for Church purposes. The secretary of the Church is Mr. W. H. Rigby, 12, Queen's Park-terrace, and the treasurer is Mr. J. J. Widdup, 12 Merlin-road.

Burnley (Presentation).—On Sunday afternoon in the Trafalgar-street Unitarian Sunday-school, an address to Mr. Peter Bibby was presented, on his retirement from active work in the Sunday-school after sixty years of service. He himself, unfortunately, was prevented by indisposition, and the very inclement weather from being present, and the address was therefore handed to his elder daughter. Mr. Matthew Jobbing presided, and, after a hymn and prayer by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, spoke of his long friendship with Mr. Bibby, which went back to the old Padiham days before he moved to Burnley. Mr. Samuel Holden spoke of his remarkable devotion to Sunday-school work, and Mr. J. S. Mackie then made the presentation. His only claim, he said, to that position was that he had known and worked with Mr. Bibby in that Sunday-school for a longer period than any other person living, except Mr. James Bibby. He alluded to lessons of Mr. Bibby's long service—that a person was never too young and never too old to serve his fellows. He spoke of his steadfastness, his true spirit of independence, which made him persevere in the line of his duty, though differences might arise and apparent want of appreciation might sometimes discourage. Mr. Bibby had found the true path very early in his life, and he had pursued it consistently throughout his long life. The address, which was illuminated and bound in album form, recalled Mr. Bibby's sixty years of steady and strenuous labour in the Sunday-school field, and said:—"Your love of children, your zeal for truth, your enthusiasm for Sunday-school work, have always been unbounded. No considerations of personal pleasure or profit, no pressure of toil or of care, no distractions of grief or pain, no allurements of more showy and pretentious work elsewhere, could wean your steadfast heart from the labour you always loved best—the simple, homely, apparently common-place, but really sublime task of teaching the very youngest scholars in the Sunday-school." It then spoke of Mr. Bibby's devotion to Unitarianism and his work in helping to establish the Burnley Church, and was signed by the ministers and other officers of the congregation. The Rev. J. M. Whiteman added his tribute to Mr. Bibby in the form of some verses, and the meeting closed with hymn and Benediction.

Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A sale of work was held in the schoolroom of the Wilbraham-road Church on Friday and Saturday, 9th and 10th, with the object of raising £100 to meet the deficiency in the church accounts of 1905 and the current year, and for general church purposes. The sale was opened on the first day by Lady Talbot, the list of birthday honours having been just announced, which included a knighthood for her husband, Mr. W. H. Talbot, the Town Clerk of Manchester. The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, who acted as chairman, congratulated Lady Talbot on the occasion, and she, in declaring the sale open, thanked the friends for their congratulations, and expressed the warmest sympathy with the congregation in their work. On Saturday the sale was opened by Mr. Henry Pilling, of Blackburn, and formerly an active member of the church. The Rev. W. E. George, minister of the congregation, took the chair. The efforts of the Ladies' Sewing Society and the members and friends of the church generally were rewarded by a good attendance of buyers, with the result that the takings amounted to £137, leaving a net amount of £126 in hand, after payment of all expenses.

Cirencester.—On Sunday evenings, November 11 and 18, commemoration services were held, when the Rev. H. Austin preached on his forty years' ministry. He had entered on his work after the chapel had been closed for six years, and without any congregation. The late Rev. William James, of Bristol, preached the re-opening sermon. On November 11 Mr. Austin took for his text, Matt. x. 7, "Preach, the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand," the same he had chosen for his first Sunday evening. He spoke on the objects of his ministry, the measure of advance, and the hope of the future. The chief aim was the emancipation of the spirit from ignorance, superstition, and sin. In the years past the cause had had many lay workers, men and women. He had been able to lecture and hold services in many of the surrounding towns and villages. He had faith in the spread of our literature, and many thousands of our periodicals and pamphlets passed every year through his hands. On the 18th the history of the chapel was given, and some account of the ministers since 1662. The text chosen was Ps. cxix. 45, "I will walk at liberty, for I have sought thy precepts." Their free and open trust had led our Presbyterian forefathers to embrace Unitarian Christianity. The upholders of liberty had done much for the building of our great Empire. They had still much to do for "truth, liberty, and religion," and like the man of Nazareth, to go about doing good. On Thursday, the 15th, there was a well attended social gathering and tea, when addresses were delivered by the minister and the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, of Birmingham, Mr. F. Bennett, and others, followed by a musical evening. Many telegrams and congratulatory letters added to the pleasure of the evening.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—At the next meeting of this Society at Stratford on Wednesday, Nov. 28, at 7.45, Mr. A. Stephen Noel will give an address on the "Oxford Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, 1906." Lantern views of Oxford will be shown. Visitors are welcome.

Glossop.—The Rev. Jenkyn Thomas has been cordially welcomed as minister of the Fitzalan-street Church, and at the opening services last Sunday he preached two appropriate and inspiring sermons to large congregations. Special music was rendered by the choir under the leadership of Mr. J. J. Roberts.

Halifax.—The Northgate End Orchestral Society, which had its beginnings in 1882 as a branch of the Sunday School Elocution Society, and, through the kind encouragement of the Rev. F. E. Millson and other friends, grew to be a fine public institution, now known as the Halifax (Northgate End) Orchestral Society, celebrated its 25th season by a special concert on Thursday, November 15, for which a souvenir programme was issued. An overture, "Amicitia," was specially written for the occasion by the hon. conductor, Mr. Herman van Dyk, who has held that office for the past five years.

Heywood.—The anniversary services were held in the Britain Hall Unitarian Chapel on Sunday, Nov. 11. In the morning, when the Mayor and members of the Corporation were present, the Rev. T. B. Evans, was the preacher; and at night the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. A. C. Fox, of Moss Side, a son of the first minister of the Heywood church. The collections realised over £16.

Hinckley.—The Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury, delivered the last lecture of the special series at the Great Meeting on Wednesday, November 7. Mr. W. Johnson presided, and a good congregation much enjoyed the lecture. Comprehensive reports of all the lectures have appeared in the local press.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, the 17th inst., presided over by Rev. J. Morley Mills, when Mr. Blundell (Ullet-road), Rev. J. L. Haigh (Hamilton-road), Mr. Hughes (Hope-street), and the Rev. J. Morley Mills (Bootle) each gave a short address on the essentials of a superintendent. Mr. Blundell mentioned the necessity of a superintendent having the loyal support of all his teachers and promoting a good tone in the school, and also laid stress on the great need of a good library. Mr. Haigh thought health, humour, and charity were the chief essentials, which in their turn made for discipline. Mr. Hughes said an ideal superintendent ought to feel the great importance of his work, and so be able to rouse enthusiasm all through the school; that he ought to be appointed annually by the church committee, being the most important officer of the church, and so help to fill the gap so often felt between church and school; he should be a friend to all the scholars as far as possible; and should keep abreast of the time and keep up the standard of the teaching. Rev. J. Morley Mills described the working of the Bootle Sunday-school, pointing out how necessary it was for the superintendent to be free, and not himself taking a class. An interesting discussion followed. Mr. Rhodes (from the Booksellers' Company) was present with a selection of the newest books published for Sunday-school work.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—The elder scholars held a most successful dramatic evening on Wednesday, November 14, when two pieces were performed, "A Romantic Conspiracy" (a new play written by Mr. T. Lewis, of Hope-street Church, expressly for this occasion), and "Ici on Parle Français." Mr. Lewis was warmly congratulated upon the success of his play. As the hall was crowded, a substantial sum was raised for Mrs. Odgers' Crippled Children's Fund. At the third meeting of the Rathbone Literary Club on Thursday, November 15, the Rev. Charles Craddock gave an interesting address upon "The Poetry of Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning in Relation to Nature." In the absence of the President the chair was taken by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the lecturer.

London: Acton.—In the winter series of public lectures at the Unitarian Church Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., lectured on Monday evening on "Shakespeare's Mother." The speaker, in an address filled with insight and imagination, drew an admirable picture of the home life of the Shakespeare family in Warwickshire, with Mary Arden, the poet's mother, as the dominating, if not always the central figure. Scenes from the latter's courtship and married life, drawn with great ingenuity from hints in the plays and elsewhere, as well as from the ordinary historical sources, and depicted with sympathy and delightful humour, were listened to with great enjoyment by a somewhat small but most appreciative audience. The Rev. A. S. Hurn took the chair, and the meeting closed with the usual vote of thanks.

London: Bermondsey (Welcome Meeting).—On Tuesday evening a well attended meeting was held to welcome Mr. Jesse Hipperson, formerly a Wesleyan, into the charge of the work here. The chairman, Mr. J. Harrison, to whom the movement here owes a deep debt of gratitude for his help and personal interest, spoke on behalf of the Provincial Assembly, the London District Unitarian Society, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, each of which wished well to the new worker. The Revs. W. G. Tarrant, T. E. M. Edwards, F. W. Stanley, G. Critchley, and G. Carter, the last named being a former minister, gave words of welcome and counsel to Mr. Hipperson and the congregation. Mr. G. Callow, who paid a warm tribute to the work and personal worth of the Rev. E. Thompson, their ex-minister, said Mr. Hipperson had already proved himself highly acceptable to the congregation and schools. Letters were read from several friends, including the Rev. A. Hall, of Norwich, whence also a telegram of greeting came from the committee of the Octagon Chapel during the meeting. Mr. Waller, of Norwich, spoke as to Mr. Hipperson's good work there. Mr. Hipperson gave a vigorous reply, referring to the special conditions of work in that district, sketching plans for extending the Church's influence, and bespeaking the co-operation of the members. It was generally felt that following on the good work done by his predecessor, the new minister in charge has an opening full of promise.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps is to preach at a special service on Tuesday evening next at 8.15.

London: Stamford-street.—On Wednesday evening next, at 8 o'clock, Miss Harriet Johnson, of Liverpool, is to give an address on her recent visit to the Temperance Congress in America. All friends will be welcome at the meeting.

Manchester: Temperance Festival.—The fourth annual temperance festival of the Bands of Hope and Guilds associated with the Manchester District Sunday School Association was held on Saturday last. The choir of over 150 scholars assembled for a final united rehearsal in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, where they also had tea together, proceeding afterwards in procession to the Memorial Hall. Unfortunately the weather was most inclement, and the audience was in consequence considerably below the average of previous years, otherwise the festival was a marked success. The singing was of a very high order, the children entering heartily into the spirit of their most defiant and warlike temperance choruses. Mr. Oliver Heys, who, as in previous years, had had the training of the children, also accompanied and conducted at the festival. Solos were also given by Mrs. Heys. Mr. J. Wigley, chairman of the Association's Temperance Committee, presided over the gathering. The speakers for the evening were Mr. J. H. Reynolds and the Rev. N. Anderton. Short addresses were also given by Mr. John Heys, a veteran temperance worker in Manchester, and by the Revs. W. Holmshaw and C. Peach.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The anniversary services were held last Sunday. In the morning the Rev. C. Peach described the conditions out of which the congregation arose nearly 120 years ago. There was a very full congregation in the evening, when the service was largely musical.

Mossley.—The annual Sale of Work of the Stamford-road Christian Church was held on Saturday, Nov. 17, and was very successful. Mr. Franklin Lawton presided. An interesting speech was delivered by Mr. Wm. Healey, J.P., of Heywood, who opened the sale, and gave a handsome donation on behalf of himself and Mrs. Healey. A vote of thanks was moved by Councillor Wm. Lees, and seconded by the Rev. J. E. Stead, to which Mr. Healey responded, and moved a similar vote to the chairman, which was seconded by Mr. M. Dawson. The total receipts are £217 19s.

Newry.—A sermon on "What is Orthodoxy?" preached by the Rev. G. V. Crook in the Unitarian Church on Sunday evening, is printed in full in the Newry Reporter of November 20.

Rochdale.—The Blackwater-street congregation has suffered a great loss by the death of Mr. William Henry Taylor, who for many years was an untiring worker in church and school. His chief service was rendered in connection with the Clover-street church, which was amalgamated with the old church in Blackwater-street about fifteen years ago. He was secretary of the Sunday-school for about thirty years, and superintendent for several years. For over thirty years he was a chorister. On the church committee he served for many years, and was for some time secretary. He was the founder of the Clover-street school savings bank, and its secretary for over thirty years. Many other offices he held, and he remained in harness up to the end. His death was painfully sudden, he expired in the workshop from heart disease. At the funeral service, which was attended by a large company of his associates in church and school work, a touching tribute was paid to his memory by his old friend, the Rev. J. C. Hirst, of Gateacre. The Rev. T. P. Spedding also took part in the funeral service.

We hear from the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, who is at present in charge of the Free Protestant Church at Cape Town, while the Rev. R. Balmforth takes a much-needed rest, that Mr. Balmforth was to sail for home by the Galician on Nov. 12. As the church is usually closed in January, Mr. Davis himself intends to return at the end of the year. On Sunday evening, Oct. 28, after a sermon in memory of Michael Servetus, he received seven members out of the confirmation class into the fellowship of the church; adult attendants, who also signed the register, made an acquisition of ten new members.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A FINAL appeal for the Martineau Centenary Memorial at Norwich will be found in our present issue. We earnestly commend it to all people of good will.

A WELCOME card from Dr. Crothers tells of his arrival home at Cambridge, Mass., on Sunday, November 11, in time for morning service. He wrote a day or two later from among the hills of New Hampshire, where he had gone to look after the little summer home, which this year he and Mrs. Crothers had been obliged to neglect. "All very well" was his report.

THE REV. John Reid, minister of the Unitarian Church at Adelaide, South Australia, at his week-evening services, has been going regularly through Dr. Carpenter's book on "The First Three Gospels," and his hearers have been deeply interested. He has also held a meeting at his own house on Friday afternoons for ladies, and the sixpenny edition of "The First Three Gospels" has been used as a text book. Last year Mr. Reid did the same with Mr. Armstrong's book, "God and the Soul," with excellent results.

A FURTHER letter from Dr. Tudor Jones, dated Wellington, October 16, following his letter of September 5, which appeared in THE INQUIRER of October 27, tells of the annual meeting of his congregation in the previous week, and visits from Mr. Mackey, of Auckland, and Mr. Lawrence Holt, of Liverpool, which were much appreciated. The work continues to prosper, and Dr. Tudor Jones's enthusiasm is boundless. "Every day," he writes, "I become more convinced of the possibilities of Unitarianism." Friends will be glad to hear that Mrs. Jones had made further progress towards recovery, and was able to get about a little when her husband wrote. The annual meeting was very well attended, and was full of enthusiasm. The congregation has now the problem of a church building to face, which is very serious, as land, Dr. Jones says, is as dear as in the Strand! The attendance at the services is fully maintained, and Dr. Jones reports about fifty adults attending his week night philosophy class.

A LEAFLET issued by the N.U.T.A., in connection with Temperance Sunday, contained an appeal by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, entitled "A Movement of National Defence." The cry for efficiency, he says, must be attended to, and this for the sake not only of being able to face external foes, but others which are in our midst. "What are these enemies within our gates? They are disease, dirt and demoralisation. Greater efforts than ever are being made to combat them, but the need is still most urgent." Much is being done also to save the rising generation from that degeneracy, the evils of which, if not cured, must spell national decay. But apart from all public movements and much-needed legislation, "there is one thing," Mr. Tarrant declares, "we can all do, and it really goes to the root of the matter much more than some of the proposed remedies. We can begin at once to reform the personal habits of the people; and, of course, the very beginning is with ourselves, who are the part of the people closest to hand. Let us try to be 'efficient.' Let us qualify ourselves in every way to serve our country well. Let us keep our blood clean and our brains sound. Let us fight the great enemy Drink, acknowledged to be such by all the wisest statesmen, judges, doctors, teachers, scientists, and employers of labour—let us fight it hand to hand, not simply by supporting legislation, but, so far as we may, by opposing its use in our homes and all about us. 'Here and here did England help me, how can I help England?' asks Robert Browning. Here is a way open to us all, a way leading to national health, wealth, strength, and honour. Who will take that way to day?"

ATTENTION to the crisis in the fate of the Education Bill is becoming acute, and he would be a bold prophet who should pretend to forecast the issue. The air has been full of threats and defiance; not unmixed, however, with voices more sweetly reasonable. Leaving the demonstrations of a more militant nature to themselves, we notice that in the Premier's letter to his party's great meeting this week some indication appeared to be given that adjustment on some controverted points was not impossible; and a similar note occurred in the remarks made earlier by the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose illness all regret. We cannot say that any obvious way out of the deadlock presents itself and, it seems to us, one or other of the parties must surrender points hitherto declared vital; otherwise the Bill must be abandoned. We should be sorry for that, but still more sorry if a Bill were passed with the sanction of a Liberal majority imposing tests on teachers, for instance. The service of the State, in whatever branch, ought to be open to all citizens without distinction of sect. Any service incompatible with this principle is not properly a service of the State.

A STRIKING sermon on "Divine Authority" by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, preached in the City Temple on Sunday morning, November 18, appears in this week's Christian Commonwealth. All spiritual truth, he declared, carries within itself the witness of Divine authority, and having spoken of how a persecuting Church has treated such truth, as in the person of Huss and Wiclif, he went on to describe the treatment meted out to the present-day restatement of Christian truth. "There has arisen to-day," he said, "from every part of the intellectual horizon a new vision, a wider view of the meaning of the Christian revelation; Men of science and men of letters as well as preachers of the Gospel are the prophets of the new era. You may recognise it in the breaking away from outworn intellectual forms of religious belief called the venerable creeds. Ecclesiasticism is crumbling before that new divine word in every civilised country on the face of the globe. I should be false to myself and to my mission if I were to conceal from you the fact that I believe that you and I have something to do, and a not unimportant part to play in that divine work. What is the message that is being thus declared? It would take me long to state it, and indeed it is impossible to state it in its fulness, but briefly outlined it is: The essential divinity of man; his unbroken oneness with God; the salvability of the race as a whole, and not merely of an individual here and there; the unity of all life, the hither and the yonder, this side and the further side of the change called death; the divine appointment of the struggle and the pain which are the necessary conditions of the manifestation of the essential nature of Eternal Love; the identity of divine justice, mercy, righteousness, love, truth—these ought never to have been separated the one from the other, for they never have been separated in the being of God; the home-gathering of mankind to that Eternal heart whence it came, a process in which every saviour of the race shall willingly labour and suffer, until all selfishness has been destroyed and every sinner has become a Christ. That is the word of God for to-day, and that is eternal truth. I believe it to be the real Gospel of Jesus, declared in his noble life and self-sacrificing death. If it had never been inscribed on the pages of Holy Writ, I could still read it in the consecrated lives of the followers of Jesus all the centuries through. I call it self-evident, because no true man can see it and reject it. It commands intellect, conscience, and heart. But it may be obscured. What are men doing with it? The few receive it, and with gladness believe it; but ignorance on the one side and wickedness on the other are seeking to make short work of it." For various forms of ignorance Mr. Campbell had sympathy and respect, but for wilful perversion of the truth only scathing denunciation.

WHILE Mr. Campbell was preaching that sermon, the Rev. F. A. Russell at the King's Weigh House Church was preaching on "The Person of Christ." The following passage is from a report of the sermon in last week's Christian World:—"Two of the Gospels sought, no doubt quite sincerely, to give dramatic significance to Christ's birth as occurring at Bethlehem and being announced by angels and hailed by Magi. But Christ was born at Nazareth. He was the son of Joseph and Mary. History was an illustration of God's desire to get himself expressed as Saviour among men in consonance with free rational experience. He tried to come in the gentle Buddha. But he exalted the spirit at the expense of the flesh, and his love became a pessimism. He tried to come in Confucius, the avatar of the middle class. But he simply regenerated earth at the expense of heaven and man. He tried to come in Socrates, who brought philosophy from the clouds. But this was light without love, and love is and will be the master thing. Then, as the result of the travail of prophets and psalmists, a girl-wife in despised Nazareth bore a child to Joseph the carpenter, and He was the Redeemer of the world. Was it not beautiful? Did it not make God real to us? Before Christ spoke about the Father-God psalmists and prophets had called God Father. But the power of a word lies in the amount of soul you put into it. Christ made the Father our Refuge. His prayer was on the lips of all Christianly nurtured men and women. Christ discovered the soul of man. No man was to Him common or unclean. He endorsed His convictions on Calvary's mournful hill. He did not do this to placate God, but to fulfil His own soul. Calvary crowns the rational universe, and Christ is the saving Person at the centre of history."

THE Rev. Silvester Horne has recently been conducting a mission in Scotland of a type which is rather a novelty in the northern kingdom. His immediate object was not to secure the conversion of individuals as a means of winning the masses to the Church, but to stimulate the Church in its duty towards the masses—to gain, not the people for the church, but the church for the people. His campaign led him to Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee, Govan and Glasgow. The pith of his message was the need for institutional churches: This is a subject which Mr. Horne has had very much at heart, while the busy work at the transformed Whitefields Tabernacle has deepened his conviction of its value. The Institutional Church has become the vehicle of much of the zeal and younger thought of the evangelical bodies generally, and is for Mr. Horne a framework which is large enough, and sufficiently elastic, to contain his religious philosophy of society. It is a strange and significant development in the land of Knox.

The final test of Christianity, according to Mr. Horne, is whether the sheets are clean and the houses fit to live in, whether children are able to play in the playgrounds and the streets, whether life is humanised, civilised, Christianised. His plea is for what he calls a human church. Christianity must reform the publichouse, abolish the bookmaker, establish rent courts in the cities to fix fair rents. But if the churches are going to reconstruct, they must first be reconstructed themselves. Incidentally, Mr. Horne distinguished between the Institutional Church in which he believes and the Mission Church. His description of the latter is not applicable to all Missions, but aptly describes far too large a number. Many churches consider their duty discharged if they put down a mission in a poor district. Here they send the forms they themselves no longer care to sit on, and the broken backed hymn-books they will no longer sing from: "And yet people begin to wonder that the working classes of this country were being alienated from the church!"

THE idea of the Institutional Church is distinguished by Mr. Horne from two earlier movements. The first is described as evangelism, which has failed because it is not thorough enough. The second is the settlement idea. This also, in his view, had failed, because settlements existed in the main for the study of the social problem. It is quite true that settlements have not realised all that have been hoped of them; but to say they have failed is hardly kind, and, moreover, is not true. On the contrary, it would be difficult to over-estimate the influence of the settlements in creating or fostering the present sense of social responsibility which is stirring the churches like a February thaw. We do not ourselves expect quite so much from the Institutional Church as Mr. Horne does. But within limits the movement is a good one; and the leadership of a man whose faith knows no qualifications is a splendid preparation to making these limits as wide as possible.

"VERY serious," says the Church of England Pulpit and Ecclesiastical Review, "is the decrease in the number of candidates for Holy Orders. During the ecclesiastical year just concluded 558 deacons have been ordained, as against 642 who were ordained ten years ago. The average of the last three years has been 543, as compared with the average of 626 of the first three years of the same decennial period. Similarly, there has been a steady decrease in the educational attainments of ordination candidates—judging, that is, from their possessing university degrees. Ten years ago fifty-nine per cent. of the deacons ordained were graduates of either Oxford or Cambridge; but this year only forty-nine per cent. had taken degrees at these universities."

THE November number of the Manchester University Magazine contains a portrait of Mrs. Fielden, of Todmorden, and an interesting article on her educational work. At the close of the last session she received from the University the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters. "Outsiders," says the writer of the article, "may be inclined to suppose that this honour has been conferred as an acknowledgment of Mrs. Fielden's benefactions to the University, and to other places of education in Lancashire; but, as the Vice-Chancellor pointed out at the time, this is by no means the case. She was for the greater part of her life a devoted teacher of young children, a student of educational methods, and lecturer to teachers, working for the improvement of education in days which now seem to us the dark age of Elementary Education—long before the era of the Board School." A native of Liverpool, where she was born Nov. 5, 1819, a daughter of Mr. J. Aston Yates, and granddaughter of the Rev. John Yates, of Paradise-street Chapel, who founded the first undenominational elementary schools in Liverpool, Mrs. Fielden from early years took a deep practical interest in education, as witness her schools at Todmorden, and her evidence before the Royal Commission of 1888. She founded the Chair of Education at Owens College, and continues to the present time her generous interest in the progress of the good work.

THE Christmas Mystery Play Eager Heart is again to be given in the Hall at Lincoln's Inn on Wednesday and Friday, Dec. 12 and 14, at 8.15 p.m., and on Thursday and Saturday, Dec. 13 and 15, at 3.15 p.m. Tickets ranging from 2s. to 10s. may be had at the Montague Fordham Gallery, 9, Maddox-street, or from Messrs. Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond-street, W.

LOVERS of flowers will find much pleasure in turning over the pages of Mr. H. B. Pollard's pamphlet, "A Garden ever in Bloom." It is, indeed, only the advertisement of an Evesham market gardener, but it makes a charming picture-book, and certainly serves its purpose in making one want to get those flowers.

ESSAYS ON SOCIAL QUESTIONS.*

THE Wesleyan Methodist Union for Social Service has not been long in justifying its existence. This volume is an admirable introduction to the study of that large range of subjects known as social questions, especially to those who approach the consideration of them from the point of view of Christian sympathy.

The editor writes modestly as to the claims of the book to public attention, but what he does claim the contents of the book fully confirm. It is written, so it is urged, from the point of view of Evangelical Christianity. We welcome with congratulation and delight a new note in Evangelical Christianity, which this work proves. "Salvation," says Mr. Keeble, "means much more than the salvation of the soul. . . . It involves the whole man, and in real measure finally the whole environment. . . . Christian personalities cannot flourish in a malignantly unideal, tempting, corrupting social atmosphere or industrial condition. They may live heroically, like trees on a bleak coast, but they never realise their potentialities, and may perish." The simile is a good one, and helps us to see the beauty which has been, and can be added to human character by helpful and encouraging conditions of life.

The essays are divided into three sets of five each, headed respectively Historical and General, Labour and Poverty, Citizenship and Service. The fifteen contributors naturally send articles of unequal value. One wonders why it was thought necessary to drag John Wesley into a work of this kind dealing with social problems of the twentieth century. To our idea he does not seem at all at home. Mr. Rattenbury, who writes the article on "John Wesley and Social Service," tries hard to bring some of his recorded sayings into line, venturing the deliberate opinion that he, John Wesley, would have been a Socialist, wherein Mr. Rattenbury only declares his own political faith, not that of John Wesley. The article on the "Drink Question" is inferior to the rest. The course of study recommended in this essay would occupy the lifetime of any ordinary man, and leave him very little time to pay any attention to the subjects dealt with by the other fourteen essayists. The reader will find six articles at least of really first-rate ability and most helpful to any study of the questions with which they deal: "The Call and Credentials of Social Christianity," by Harry Bissiker, M.A.; of the Leysian Mission; "Christianity and Socialism," by Frank Ballard, of Newcastle-on-Tyne; "The Citizen and Unemployment," by George W. Macarthur; "Gambling, a Social Cancer," by J. Ash Parsons, also of the Leysian Mission; "The Housing of the Citizens," by Arthur Page Grubb, assistant editor of the Methodist Times; and "Women and Social Problems," by Marie Stuart.

Mr. Percy Bunting's article on "The Land and the Citizen," is well worth reading, but it is very timid and cautious in its treatment of a subject which probably more than any other calls for firm and drastic measures of relief.

Mr. Bissiker's essay we heartily commend to those who are looking askance at the movement in our own community to identify the churches with social reform; or at least with the desire to study it. Early in this article Mr. Bissiker reaches the sound dual position: "For social reformers to separate themselves from Christianity would be to abandon the only power which can transform these ideals into realities. For Christian workers to regard social conditions as outside the sphere of their activity and influence would be to betray a maimed conception of the teaching of their Lord, and a partial appreciation of the meaning of his life and death." The argument here stated is well maintained throughout the essay, which insists on the power of the motive force of Christianity in dealing with the evils of the conditions of life as well as with life itself, showing, by the way, the interdependence of these conditions upon one another, and clearly points out that the message of Jesus to the world was a "spiritual message with a social application," and finally emphasises the close connection between the "malignant" (to use the editor's own word) social conditions and a degraded moral and spiritual state. Sweated industries, overcrowded and insanitary houses, easy temptations to drink and worse—these are conditions created by men, and allowed to exist by men. Unless we do all in our power to undo that which has been so vilely done and allowed to remain, we cannot free ourselves from responsibility. Mr. Bissiker, with a courage we must all admire, does not hesitate to arraign Christianity itself, and to declare that it is on trial in this matter, and according to its action will it stand or fall. "No church," he says, "which neglects the social aspect of her duty is able to give to the world an adequate expression of Christianity."

Mr. Ballard's essay on "Christianity and Socialism" supplements and confirms the article by Mr. Bissiker, but Mr. Ballard more particularly addresses himself to the Socialists who are bent upon showing their antagonism to Christianity, or at least to the Christian Churches as they exist at present. The article on "The Citizen and Unemployment" ably reviews the necessity for classification of the unemployed, and the treatment of the different groups according to their special needs, separately and not together. The suggestions for various remedies are admirably and briefly stated, and as far as we can see fairly complete. The essay on "Gambling" furnishes a clear and scientific review of the evil effects, the probable causes, and the likeliest remedies of this evil, which the writer says more swiftly and more completely demoralises its victims than any other he knows. He is convinced of the interdependence of all these problems. "Gambling is bound up with such problems as those of Poverty, Sweating, Unemployment, Housing, and the Land." We ought to add that each essay is followed by a list of recommended books and pamphlets for reading, which seem to have been carefully compiled. They might in some instances, notably on the Land question, be extended with advantage, but the object of the Union has evidently been to encourage study, and perhaps it is as well not to place too large a programme before the young people for whose use the editor explains the book has been mainly prepared.

We congratulate the Wesleyan Union upon their helpful "Social Service" in the publication of this work.

ENGLISH LITERATURE*

It used to be a common belief among schoolboys, half a century ago, that England had never suffered defeat by sea or land—and that one Englishman was the equal in battle of three, or (though not unconscious of a little exaggeration) one would venture to say ten Frenchmen. The true glory of England, undisputed and inalienable by the chances of time one first learnt when admitted by a knowledge of other tongues and study in foreign parts to citizenship in the Republic of Letters. It is not her empire, which is of recent date, nor her commerce, which may go as it has come, but her literature which made England great among the nations with a superiority of which she can never be deprived.

"To see ourselves as others see us" is generally more wholesome than pleasant, for we are apt to value what is our own much above its true worth. But to hear and read what esteemed foreigners make of our great writers should open our eyes to merits which before we have been ignorant of, and fill us with just pride in our countrymen. And this latest testimony of a distinguished Frenchman to the interest and value of English literature should stimulate us to whom it rightly belongs to a higher appreciation of our common wealth.

From the Germans we are perhaps right to expect more, for they come of the same Teutonic stock, and their language is closely akin to ours, but that French authors of the eminence of M. Taine and M. Jusserand should each have undertaken to write a complete survey of a literature whose genius is so foreign to that of their own tongue, is a notable fact, and much to the credit both of France and England. And indeed our author would not admit that the divergence is as great as on an a priori view it appears to be, for German literature is on the whole a modern product. Whereas "in this lies one of the great attractions of English and French literature that they have both of them remote origins: ample, beautiful, measureless, no one will make the complete circuit of either; it is impossible to write their history in full." And it is gratifying to read the opinion of a foreign observer in opposition to the many who are despondent about the present state of letters:—"Both literatures have a splendid present betokening a splendid future. Both are alive to-day and vigorous; ready to baffle the predictions of pessimists, and showing no signs of decay. They await at all times transformation but not death. Side by side, or face to face, in peace or war, both literatures, like both peoples, have been in touch for centuries, and in spite of hates and jealousies they have more than once imparted new life one to the other. These actions and reactions began long ago in the time of the Normans, and even before; when Taillefer sang Roland, and when Alcuin of York taught Charlemagne." This was written before these happy days of the "l'entente cordiale," an understanding which we cherish with all the warmer devotion because we cannot forget how frail such alliances are, and have read of the enthusiasm excited on both sides of the Channel by the reconciliation brought about at Amiens and soon followed by ten years of bloody warfare.

they sang in the Opera House at Paris, and London responded with no less exuberance of delight. But if the friendship of nations is always unstable, and no treaty is long binding, it is all the more important to insist upon those ancient and imperishable ties which bind them alike "in peace and war, and in spite of hates and jealousies" constantly recrudescent.

And to this end the present work will help all the more because, as the author says: "It is not, properly speaking, a History of English Literature," an account of books whose loves and hates sleep with their writers and rarely wake to move us, "but rather a Literary History of the English People," which lives on and is one through the ages and finds for itself continual expression in the varying moods of poetry and prose. But the task M. Jusserand has set himself is one of difficulty, and he confesses that "he wonders at the boldness of his undertaking." Indeed, it is one not to be accomplished otherwise than tentatively and in part. "The growing into shape of the people's genius and the various manifestations of it from time to time" is not to be told by way of biographies and epitomes and catalogues of works. It is, as our author pleads in excuse for the imperfection of his performance, "as difficult to measure with rule as 'the myst on Malverne hilles.'"

M. Jusserand has, as he tells us, qualified himself for the great work he has undertaken by living in our country "for a number of years in contact with the people, in calm and stormy days." Born at Lyons in 1855 he took his doctor's degree in literature at the University of Paris, and then entered the French Foreign Office. He was councillor at the London Embassy, from 1887 to 1890, and is at present Ambassador at Washington, where he may observe the latest developments of the English mind and its expression under circumstances which differ so immensely from those under which our earlier literature grew up.

The present instalment of the translated work corresponds to the first half of the over bulky second volume in French, and contains the history from the accession of Henry VIII. to the time of Spenser. Independently of the literature the brief but lucid account of the Renaissance and Reformation in England will be read with great interest by students of the History of Religion.

SHORT NOTICES

The Way of Peace for a Twentieth Century Disciple. In successive numbers of THE INQUIRER, from August 11 to September 22, these "Seven Decades" of counsel for the deepening of present day religious life and the nurture of a vigorous faith first appeared. They are now published separately, in a form which will make them for many friends a welcome Christmas missive, and the author has the permission of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke to quote his word of approval: "I like them very much indeed, and I am sure they will help many on the right way." Our readers have already had the opportunity of judging of the quality of this booklet. It is produced in attractive form, and we need not do more here than commend it further to the attention of our readers. It is prefaced by the following note: "The writer of the following aphorisms is indebted for the suggestion of form to the well-known work of Jeremy Taylor. The gentle reader will be both courteous and discriminating who looks for no other similarity." (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 6d. net.)

The Watts Pictures in the National Gallery of British Art (Tate Gallery), with Prefatory Note on the Painter, by Katherine F. Lawford. This booklet ought to be on sale at the Tate Gallery, with the official catalogues, to encourage young people especially in the study of that great series of pictures collected together in the Watts Room. Miss Lawford's notes on the twenty-one pictures are arranged, not according to their position in the room, but in the order of subjects, marking the unfolding of the artist's thought on the profoundest questions of life and human destiny. It is as teacher and prophet that we are asked to turn to Watts and the study of his pictures. "His life," Miss Lawford says in the prefatory note, "was spent in trying to help and comfort and teach through his painting. Many of his allegorical pictures are not fully appreciated from lack of the desire to understand them. They were painted to make people think. To quote from the artist's own words, 'My intention has not been to paint pictures to charm the eye, so much as to suggest great thoughts that will appeal to the imagination and the heart, and kindle all that is best and noblest in humanity.' " Miss Lawford's notes are admirably calculated to serve the purpose for which they have been prepared. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 2d.)

A Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Meetings is re-issued by the Committee of the National Conference Guild Union in a second improved edition. Music has been added in the page for the responses, and a collection of thirty-one hymns, suitable for use at a Guild service, has been added. The manual may be welcomed for private use also by others besides Guild members. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 3d.)

The Moral Teaching of James Martineau, by Alfred Hall, M.A., is the paper read last July at Manchester College, Oxford, at the summer session for Sunday-school teachers. Emeritus Professor Upton says of it:—"I have much enjoyed the reading of this Paper. I think it is a correct and admirably lucid presentation of Dr. Martineau's views, and I feel no doubt that our teachers and others will find it most interesting and valuable." It will form a welcome appendix to Mr. Hall's little book, in which he has told for young people the story of Dr. Martineau's life. The character of Dr. Martineau's ethical teaching, the inwardness of its appeal, its fundamental importance for religious faith, Mr. Hall has well brought out. The great teacher's message to teachers, interwoven as it is with his ethics, is thus summarised: "Always remember the child is on your side: that he loves the truth for its own sake: and that if you wish to call forth his admiration, you must bring in no teaching about pleasure, or profit, or worldly prudence. However much the man of position and the successful dealer may be set as an example before the child the lessons of sweet self-sacrifice, of truth, of faith and hope and love, will win the quickest way to his heart. The story of the widow's mite, of Paul faithful and hopeful in the midst of persecutions and dangers, and of Jesus loving and true to the last, will always keep their charm for the young." Mr. Hall makes good use of the "Endeavours" in his account of Dr. Martineau's teaching. His paper in this pleasant form, a small 48-page pamphlet in excellent large type, should receive a warm welcome. (Sunday-school Association, 4 and 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 3d.)

BOSTON, MASS.

THE passing from New York to Boston in an instructive transition. Paris is not France, and New York is not the United States.

Boston does not surprise, or even arrest, one's notice by age, or newness, or strangeness. If you enter by the harbour and river, with their ferries and wharves, you are reminded of Liverpool at once; if you arrive at the great South Station, you may imagine yourself in Birmingham; Tremont-street in the centre suggests Princes-street, Edinburgh. But in its numerous and spacious parks, its fine, broad avenues, and its beautiful suburbs, it certainly surpasses our own cities.

Its streets are dominated, and almost monopolised, by close lines of trolley cars—electric, quick, incessant, importunate, and packed to their utmost limits with half-suffocated strap-hangers. Except in the shopping districts, nobody walks, and hence the pavements have a deserted appearance. Moreover, Boston is also disfigured by an elevated railroad. What a convenience! Why, yes, but what a noise and ugliness, and ruin of nerves! The wild scene in the subway, where the elevated dives underground in both directions, and the surface trolley cars do likewise, and where the surging crowds struggle for seats, is worse than anything on the underground in London, and forces one to abandon the illusion of a quiet and slow-moving Boston. But there is less wholesale hustle than in New York, and you can more easily get out of the racket.

Of the few old buildings which still stand in witness of Boston's historic past, the most interesting and conspicuous are the Old State House, the Old South Meeting House, one of its most famous landmarks; Christ Church, in the steeple of which the signal lanterns gave warning of the British troops; Faneuil Hall, called fittingly "The Cradle of Liberty," and King's Chapel, which expunged from its liturgy both the king and the trinity. It is moving to preach and pray in this quaint, old haunt of Episcopacy, but all the singing was "done" by the quartet party in the gallery, and only the friendly greetings of six divines could warm the chilliness out of one's bones. Oh, Boston congregations, why don't you sing yourselves and make a joyful noise!

If Boston is the "hub of the universe," its pivot is the gilt roof of the State House. (Does a hub have a pivot?) But the modern city concentrates its better architecture in Copley-square, where the splendid public library, with Sargent's lunettes of the Prophets; the rich Museum of Fine Arts; the elaborate, but dark, Trinity Church of Phillips Brooks, and Dr. Gordon's New Old South, with its tall campanile of copper, make an imposing group together. Dr. Gordon, a Congregationalist, now draws the crowds who once thronged Trinity Church. He is earnest, honest, and direct in his pulpit appeals, has much influence amongst the Harvard students, and is not afraid to fraternise with Unitarians, or appear at their meetings. But the most interesting feature of the Boston churches is the number of Episcopal ministers in trouble with their creeds.

Why are English cities generally, and London especially, so chary with their public statues to true patriots and great citizens? Boston is more generous in its remembrance: it is rich in monuments. Columbus and Ericson, Washington and Franklin, Harrison and Lincoln, Winthrop and Andrew, Adams and Quincey, Everett and Prescott, Webster and Sumner, Hamilton and Horace Mann—these and other worthies in conspicuous public places speak daily to the passer-by of the heroes of his history. One is made to cry continually, "London, please copy." The Channing monument in Arlington-street is a disappointment, bearing no comparison with the fine statue at Newport. When will there be an Emerson? Why not?

Boston and culture are supposed to belong to each other, and always go closely together. How far this is the case, if a high test be used, it is not possible for a visitor of two months' to fairly gauge. Boston is fond of melodrama, especially of a scriptural flavour, and it is not quite sure about the "message" of Bernard Shaw. But in that little matter it is, perhaps, not peculiar. H. G. Wells succeeded in fluttering the doves of the Bostonians by characterising their culture-ideal as ineffectual and unoriginal, distributing souvenirs of the past instead of making contributions to the present, collecting autotypes and plaster casts instead of creating new works, wasting leisure and energy on genteel remoteness, and thus frittering away moral and intellectual possibility. A scathing and unsparing indictment and, doubtless, guilty of over-statements. It may rank with the old canard that America is the most common-schooled and least educated country in the world. But each structure hints at a danger of which the true educator is not unaware. The American system of university training seems to raise the average of general attainment, while lowering the standard of special scholarship. Be that as it may, however, two features to admire meet the observer everywhere. One is the keen, if sometimes restless, inquisitiveness after fresh knowledge typified in the phrase "I want to know." The other is a much readier willingness than with us to exchange opinions on burning questions. There is no precautionary clause in their debating societies that "Religion and politics shall not be discussed"! It may be, perhaps, that the absence of a state church places all variant theologies on the same level of acceptance, and that the non-existence of a hereditary House of Lords gives no special prestige to one school of politics. The fact remains that the interchange of candid opinions, and the intercourse of frank opposites is more open and free, and in a delightful way. As an instance may be mentioned the Twentieth Century Club. This club was established "to promote a finer public spirit and a better social order," but its method of procedure is not to enrol members of any one social or political colour, or to commit them to this or that panacea, but to hear both sides of a plan or idea, and to offer a free arena for every earnest reformer. Charles Fletcher Dole, the president and chairman, is our honoured minister at Jamaica Plain, whose works have an English circulation, and under his leading this vigorous club of earnest men stands for ideal ends in Boston. Public Biblical lectures are given in the Club Hall, but the chief interest centres in the weekly club luncheons and debates, at which special speakers introduce their own subjects. To be an invited English guest is a very pleasant privilege, and to be allowed to go for the opener a special honour. But when a university professor, announced to speak on "The Higher Culture," indulges instead in a strange tirade against Latin and ancient literature, on the ground that they are useless and dead, and the past so much meaningless dust, how can you sit still in your place? One sometimes fears that the Americans have neither appreciated nor assimilated the past in their ideas, and that in their roll of fame the scholar is not on the list. But Boston business men are not all utilitarian, and there were many in the room who responded to the plea for a truer and wider sympathy, for a culture which blends history and prophecy into ordered unity, the impulses of the past with the ideals of to-day.

If my soul be made alive, no matter who ministers to me; and if not, the ordinances of the church, whether high or low, orthodox or heretical, are of no validity so far as I am concerned. The diseased man who is restored to health cares little whether his physician wear wig or cowl, or receive his diploma from Paris or London; and so to the regenerate man it is of little moment where or by what processes he became a temple of the Holy Spirit.—Channing.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

WINTER is here in our Rhaetian Highlands. Snow lies everywhere, not deep, but hard; the sun shines gloriously through frosty air, and everybody is in a good humour. The very conductor who examined [my twelve-journey ticket between Samaden and St. Moritz beamed kindness on all his subjects. (I wonder what his mood is like at the other end of the journey, down in Rheintal.) He took the poor worn card, fringed with twenty-three punch-holes, looked at it pityingly, then at me, withdrew his instrument as if overmastered by compassion, nerved himself, did the deed, cried "Schluss!" as if a book and a life came to an end together, punched the ruin, and passed on. It was the slightest piece of by-play, without a touch of buffoonery, but genuinely humorous.

Humour is but the effluence of good humour. How comes it, then, that humour is so often concerned with the uncomfortable or the gruesome? And how comes it that wit, which we are always distinguishing from humour, because we cannot help thinking of the two together, joins hands so often with malice? While we are in a good humour, let us think it out.

We are all of us humorous sometimes for the worst tempers have their little lapses into kindness, but some of us are never witty. "To be a well-favoured man is the gift of fortune, but to write and read comes by nature." Some are born witty, and some have wit thrust upon them, but none ever achieves wit; were it otherwise, we should all achieve it, and life would be too meteoric for endurance. But there is comfort for the unwitty. Let us reflect that wit lodges not so often in the pate of the sage as in that of the scatter-brained chatterbox. "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man." Now readiness is a great part of wit, and fulness no part at all. But readiness is not everything. Who does not know somebody, too ready by half, who always goes off at half-cock? A man with all his wits about him is no more likely to be witty than a man with all his wealth about him to be rich.

Art and effort will not create wit, but it is to them that a keen, fine, genial, sparkling, delicate wit owes its razor-edge, its needle-point, its glow, gleam, bouquet. Perfect wit is Italian Aphrodite in a Parisian gown.

O quae beatam Diva tenes Cyprum et Memphim carentem Sithonia nive
Regina,—

robed by Worth, fresh from your maid's fingers, what would you be like? The sleepy grace divine, as of some sleek, unruffled tigress, the easy sweep and decision of gesture, are as much out of scale in one of our drawing-rooms as "that large utterance of the early gods." Cytherea must halve her stride and her tones, learn to imply a gesture in a glance, to be still without being statuesque, and to be not merely graceful, but dainty. And when the Olympian savage has been tamed and cramped to our anæmic manners, what she has lost in bounty and grandeur of bearing will be more than made up in mystery, in the charm of reserve.

Where downright beauty can do no more than delight—this is a secret that every mountain in old free Rhaetia whispers—beauty which is hinted, possible, left aside of direct consciousness, will bewitch.

Wit is the more brilliant when it is controlled and urbane. Since it consists only in the appreciation of others, and Adam only began to be witty when Eve was created, it must be meted by the measure of the hearer's brain-pan. Perfect wit is that which shall win the untroubled smile of a cultured lady.

But we must put on stronger glasses. What is this readiness, which makes so great a part of wit? There is mobility in it, and resource. Mobility is for the element of the expected, begets point, is pat to the occasion. Resource is for the element of the unexpected. It finds ever new ways of causing that little shock which is the voucher and hall-mark of wit. It is for the sake of surprise rather than of point that wit dwells in phrases. A lance may be as pointed as a tack, but for the schoolboy's purpose, to add interest to his master's down-sitting and uprising, a lance is useless. Where is the elephant found? asks the riddler; and replies, The elephant is seldom mislaid. No mammoth ever scared market-woman by scurrying from behind a bramble. An eighty-ton Krupp is noisier than a pop-gun, but it does not make so many people jump.

Wit, then, is a coup, a spark, a flash, whereas humour burns like a steady fire, in proportion to its fuel. But the wood may crackle and scintillate. A mile of humour may be strung together of inches of wit. Some of Shakespeare's humour, some of Emerson's, is like a sky full of stars. Still, though spontaneity is the soul of wit—brevity is but its waist measure—though forced wit is no wit, yet there is true wit, is there not, that smells of the lamp? Hood's puns, Sheridan's impromptu epigrams, show chisel-strokes. Charles Lamb screened the nisus formativus behind his stutter, Charles Matthews behind his dramatic pause. Their labour went, however, not to manufacture, but to adorn. You may detect the limelight box, but the bubbles are genuine, and no candid soul will deny that they look prettier by limelight. Moreover, you must have your apparatus ready; in other words, you must have spent some time in compressing explosive gases. And you must aim straight before the bubble bursts:

Foam-born Aphrodite, goddess of bubbles, leaps at each call as erst on Cythera's beach. But as she rises she feels the cling of her frock, and in an instant the code closes round her. Still the impulse of her first movement prevails to seize, out of all permitted postures, looks and phrases, on that which may most gracefully express it. Given a good steel blade, good grinding, setting and strop-ping make a good razor. You shall grind, set and strop bad steel till doomsday, and wear a blue face then.

We seem to be some way from our goal. But I think we have made progress; and we will go further another time.

CONGREGATIONALISTS AND UNITARIANS.

SIR,—Permit me, as an ex-Congregationalist, a word on the rapprochement of Congregationalists and Unitarians. I use the word advisedly because, unless I am much mistaken, the movement is mutual, and is, in both cases, upward and progressive. If, on the one hand, liberal Congregationalists are moving towards the Unitarian conception of God, on the other hand liberal Unitarians are moving towards the Congregational conception of Jesus. If the former body is making for a more rational religion, the latter is making for one more emotional. The Congregationalist of the broader school, looking round on the theological position of the modern Unitarian, finds himself largely in agreement with it. And when he says so, and speaks of his attitude as new (and new it is to him) nothing is gained by the Unitarians retorting: "This is what we have been proclaiming for half a century"; for there is something more to be considered than the theological position, and that is, denominational effectiveness, or the practical issues of church work. The Congregationalist has far less fear of his creed than of his creed's "dynamic." Whatever he lets go, to this he must cling—a power to reform, gradually, or, if need be, suddenly, the morally and spiritually debased and lost. His Gospel must be a "power of God unto salvation," or it is to him no Gospel at all. Looking round on the generality of Unitarian churches, or judging them by their own reports and confessions alone, he sees that the gain of a more liberal theology is frequently heavily discounted by a loss in effective command over the characters of men.

From what I have seen of Unitarianism from within during the last three years I am convinced that, while the average Unitarian minister is alert to the findings of science, of historical and Biblical criticism, and to new light from whatever quarter it breaks, he is little more so than the average Congregational minister; whilst the average Unitarian layman (there are, of course, many far above the average) is conspicuous for his indifference to religious questions of all kinds, and is in this respect far below the average Congregational layman.

As regards the supreme claims of conscience and reason, the world is indeed coming round our way—the way of Channing, Parker, and Martineau; but if we Unitarians lay the flattering unction to our souls that the New Theology has been evolved out of our little denomination, erudite and unfettered as it is, we are but indulging a coinage of the brain. For everyone knows that Unitarians and Congregationalists alike owe that heritage to scholars of Germany, scholars of the Anglican church, and some few learned Free Churchmen, but most of all to that noble train of scientists, who, by their unflinching pursuit of truth, have revolutionised our ideas of the Universe, have given to the terms "God" and "man" newer and grander significance, and have forced out of their narrow grooves the theologians and dogmatists.

If, waiving, as not proven, the miraculous episodes of the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection, our Congregational brethren deduced from the Immanence of God the Divinity of Jesus Christ, shall not we Unitarians rejoice that they have come thus far? Shall we not meet them there; rather than chide them with having got no further? Shall we not lay aside that "bitter suavity" (to which so many among us are prone, and of which Mr. E. W. Lewis not unjustifiably complains), also that tone of impatience gendered by years of ostracism and obloquy, and prove to the world that the New Unitarianism stands quite as much for the Unity of Man as for the Unity of God? Are not our differences with our brethren largely differences of definition, or rather differences due to our failure to define our terms at all? Are Human and Divine two different things, or extremes of the same thing—the Universal Life of Intelligence and Spirit? May it not be that the Divine is but an expansion of the Human, the Human but a limitation of the Divine?

In a recent sermon, Dr. Horton, the well-known Congregational minister, said: "There is conflict between the orthodoxy of yesterday and the freer and more progressive thought of to-day, and in that controversy no one can help seeing that Unitarianism, in one form or another, is presenting itself to the intelligence of this country with a force and with a sincerity which make a deep impression on large numbers of professing Christians. It seems to me that we have not seen Unitarianism so confident or so powerful since the days of Channing and Theodore Parker in America. We must not leave young people in uncertainty. On this question of Unitarianism we must try to instruct and to help one another. We want truth at all costs. For my own part (I say it with the deepest reverence) if Jesus Christ is not the Son of God in a unique sense, and if He is not the Divine Redeemer who died for the sins of the world, precious as the faith has been to me, I am going to surrender it. I will not cling to the Divinity of Christ, nor will I cling to the doctrine of atonement simply because it is orthodoxy; it shall be true before I cling to it, and if it is proved false I surrender it. We must face that question with the utmost frankness, and be prepared to reason it out, and give the reason for the faith that is in us."

What more can we want than that? It is candour incarnate. It is also a challenge. If, indeed, we Unitarians are exceptionally confident at this present moment, conscious that freedom of thought is winning all along the line, buoyant with a sense of power which naturally results; if the gates of opportunity are opening to us wider than ever; let us see to it that our confidence degenerate not into conceit, our power into arrogance, and that with becoming humility we share the spoils of Time and Truth with our brethren of all the churches, admitting that other men laboured, and we are entered into their labours.

SUGGESTIONS ON "RESTATEMENT."

II.—THE GOSPEL.

THE inadequacy of the formula "Back to Jesus" is patent when it is seen to mean that Christianity is not a growing life, but a finished article since somewhere about the year 30. The grain of mustard seed is thus condemned to remain a grain, and the birds of the air will never lodge in its branches. But if we are in earnest with the doctrine of development, we can see that the seed and the tree are really one life. Even in simple Galilee the form of the Gospel was conditioned by the needs it had to meet; the need, e.g., to deepen morality into love; to organise the life of man more expressly into a redemptive process; to organise human fellowship into a system of divine aims and ends; to show the human bond as at once our tragedy and our hope, and so to make man reveal God; to emphasise sin and yet destroy its power; to explain the world in the light of personality, and raise the values of personality all round. All these needs it met, as the developed Gospel meets them to-day. The essential point is and was the revelation of Divine things in terms of humanity, the revelation being found in the perfect converse between Jesus and his Heavenly Father. This, however, meant much more than prayer and meditation. He found the Father most in the interactions of the spiritual organism which we know as the moral life; in which individual men are the constituents, but where the overruling purpose is God. Thus the solidarity which is implicit in every moral act became explicit and consciously felt in the communion of saints.

All these elements of the Gospel have been variously worked up into the great creeds. Our restatement, however, must be (a) spiritual rather than supernatural; and (b) humanist rather than anthropomorphic. Thus (a) in preaching God, we aim at giving men a "sense of God," which means the sense of God which Christ had. The only way to do so is to bring men somehow under the charm and into the passion of Christ's personality, make them feel how fine and enthralling are the essences of Christian piety, penitence and valour, as they are known in numberless lives. To come thus under the spell of Christ is to know God. (b) Forgiveness and salvation are no longer external events or transactions. They are processes working through the age-long toil of Christian self-sacrifice, not to be completed until every soul has come to the perfect light, and seen the dark horror of sin purged in fires of love. We are saved just in so far as we embrace the saving purpose and suffering of Christ's church: "Saving faith" means that we are so thoroughly convinced by the revelation of love therein, that saving love henceforth becomes our own impulse; we are saved just in so far as we save. To "believe in God" is thus the same thing as believing in man; in man's imperishable ideal, here brought down from the clouds, and embodied in a growing life. The modern problem is how to make the world take its own ideals seriously. For answer, it needs to be thrown hotly on those Facts which show these ideals as Reals. That is where Christianity meets the case. It can realise them because it happens to be their source. W. W.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HAVE you children little gardens of your own? I hope many of you have, for then you know the great delight of sowing seeds, and watching them come up and grow and bloom; and then, no doubt, you can do as we children did—vie with each other as to who can be the first to pick a little bunch of your own flowers for your mother on a Sunday or a "buttonhole" for father; or as to whose mustard and cress and radishes will soonest be ready for the breakfast table. A garden is a never-ending delight.

Is it not wonderful to think of all the different kinds of seeds that there are, and how each flower bears just its own seed and no other; and that each brings out just its own plant, and no other? So that if the farmer is short of oat seed he cannot sow turnip seed instead, and hope to get a crop of oats from it; nor can you in your garden sow sweet peas and expect to get mignonette. As Paul says: "What a man soweth that shall he also reap"; and as Jesus says: "Each tree is known by its own fruit, for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes."

But when we had our gardens one of the little girls who had been looking at hers came running in to our mother, exclaiming, "Oh, mamma, what do you think! I planted a bit of lilac and it came up 'old man'!" (That was the name we had for a very sweet-smelling shrub.) Of course, mother and all the children laughed, knowing that to be impossible; and the little girl was shown that she must have been mistaken as to what she had planted, or else that the bit of lilac had died and the "old man" had sowed itself close by.

But the little girl's mistake serves us for something better than to be only laughed at, for we have each got a garden to plant and look after, in which it is as true as in the gardens which we tended as children that if we plant lilac it can't come up "old man." For if a child allows himself to be mean and selfish, that seed can never bring out beautiful flowers and fruit. When a time of trial comes that child will not do any noble or unselfish thing. He did not weed his garden, throwing away the weeds and leaving space for the beautiful plants to grow and thrive; and so, when the seed grew up it could only bring forth weeds. "Of thorns men do not gather figs."

Long ago I read a story about a widow and her two children. The mother was dotingly fond of Edward, and spoiled him in every way; she taught his sister Maggie to devote herself to him also, and could not bear to thwart him in anything. Edward was rough and selfish and overbearing, and never attempted to refuse any of the spoiling or to behave kindly and nicely to his mother and sister. So he grew more and more selfish and disagreeable. His garden was planted with "thorns," from which no "grapes" could come. After many years, during which he grew more and more selfish, and when he was grown up, he did something so dishonourable and wicked that he was obliged to leave England and go to America where no one would know what he had done, to try to earn his living. Maggie was to go with him to make a home for him. They got ready and said good-bye to their friends, and set sail in a ship from Liverpool. But before the ship had passed the Orme's Head she caught fire, and the fire spread so quickly that it could not be stopped. The boats were lowered and the order was given for the children to go first and then the women. Edward got hold of Maggie by the arm and dragged her on towards the boats. As they stood waiting on the deck, a poor woman whose children had been taken first into one of the boats was close beside them, and when the word came for the women to go next, Edward dragged Maggie on, meaning to get in with her; but Maggie gently put the poor woman before her that she might be sure to go to her children. The fire was roaring and blazing behind them, and coming nearer and nearer, and Edward pressed on; and though roughly pushed back and told that only women were to go, and that the boat was more than full already, he tried to jump into it, but fell into the water and was seen no more.

Maggie was saved by her lover, who lashed her to a spar, and swam with her till they were picked up by a boat. Edward's body was washed ashore afterwards on the Welsh coast, and the poor doting mother who had parted from him so lately, only saw his face again after death.

The selfishness in which Edward had indulged himself all his life was his master when a trial came, and he died as he had lived—in selfishness. "There is no corrupt tree that bringeth forth good fruit."

It is the same in all of us, and in all we do. Sometimes a child accustoms himself to saying things which are only half the truth, for fear of being laughed at, or blamed or punished. He has not the courage to be true, and does not try to gain it; and some day he tells a whole big lie, which is the fruit from the seed he has been sowing. But we have all read and heard of people who so clung to what they felt to be true that they bore persecution for it, and even died a savage death rather than be false to it, and you cannot conceive that they could ever have told half truths, or feared to be ridiculed, blamed or punished. The seed they had sowed was truth to the core, and it bore its own fruit in a great act of faithfulness:

And so if we allow ourselves to be idle, rude, inconsiderate, selfish, cowardly, disobedient, or any other bad thing, we are sowing seeds which must bear their own fruit; not the fruit borne by industry, gentleness, thoughtfulness for others, unselfishness, courage, and obedience, any more than a field sown with chickweed could bear a crop of wheat; and no more than the bit of lilac could come up "old man." We are sowing seeds all our lives, and it is a grave thought how much it matters what we sow while we are young.

FINAL APPEAL FOR THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

A DRAWING of the proposed Centenary MARTINEAU Memorial at Norwich, with plans prepared by Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, is issued as a supplement to this week's INQUIRER, and there is also a letter from Mrs. MOTTRAM, the devoted secretary of the Memorial Committee, giving an account of the present position of the fund.

It will be seen that the building is designed in a style of domestic English architecture, thoroughly in keeping with the fine old chapel and neighbouring houses. It is to be a brick building, as the Octagon is, and for the roof red tiles are to be used. The plans show, on the ground floor, an ample vestibule and entrance hall, an infants' class-room 38 ft. by 28 ft., and another class-room 24 ft. square, together with kitchen and other accommodation. The first floor is reached by two broad staircases opening upon the lecture hall, which is 48 ft. by 38 ft., estimated to seat an audience of from 300 to 350. The class-room, 24 ft. square, is repeated, and there are two smaller rooms, while at the back of the platform is another room, separated only by a movable partition, so that it can be used as a stage when required. If the building could be so constructed that the large class-room might also be separated only by a movable partition, the hall might then, on occasion, seat 500 or more. On the second floor there is a further recreation or billiard room, the window of which is seen in the gable. At the back of the building outside there is provision for an iron emergency staircase.

This building, it will be remembered, is to be erected only on the larger half of the site, which the Committee were obliged to acquire as a whole. One of the other smaller houses, which will be left standing, is to be for the chapel keeper, and the other should bring in a rental of £20. Thus the Memorial scheme has been reduced, as Mrs. MOTTRAM says, to the minimum of what is essential to the effective carrying on of the work of the school and congregation; but the building, as Mr. CHATFIELD CLARKE has designed it, will be recognised, we trust, as not unworthy to stand as a Memorial of our great Teacher in the city of his birth.

It must, however, be distinctly understood that this Memorial is not yet achieved. There is still need of strenuous effort and generous giving, if the hope which has been cherished of such a fitting commemoration is not to end in bitter disappointment. The need of the schools is urgent, and the work of building ought to be begun at once. The congregation of the Octagon Chapel feel this very keenly, and have undertaken to be responsible for another £500 among themselves. This leaves £1,300 still to be given by other friends, who have faith in the future of the Octagon, and desire a memorial in Norwich worthy of JAMES MARTINEAU. But unless this amount can be promised by Christmas, so that the congregation may feel justified in beginning operations in the New Year, we are afraid that these plans must be abandoned, and something far less adequate, both to the need and to the occasion, be schemed instead.

Therefore it is that we have headed this article, "Final Appeal for the Martineau Memorial"; and we will venture to ask in all seriousness, Can we endure such a wrong to a great memory? It would be a humiliation we do not like to contemplate.

We have been looking at the list of subscriptions printed in March of the present year, and cannot help thinking that many of these were given in the expectation that a very much larger number would wish to have a part in this Memorial than has proved to be the case. There will, we must hope, still be many fresh donors, when the urgent need is understood; but we will ask friends to look again at that list, and, remembering the seriousness of the issue, to consider whether there are not, in a good many cases, guineas which might become tens, and tens which might be fifties, or even more. Is this an improper thing to say? The writer of these lines is a person of narrow means, but he will thankfully double his own humble donation of £5 if other friends will do the same, and so secure before Christmas that the Memorial shall not fail of worthy completion.

We may, perhaps, be forgiven if we recall at this moment some of our earlier pleadings in this matter. At the time of the Centenary celebration we wrote in THE INQUIRER of April 29, 1905:—

"More than eighty years ago JAMES MARTINEAU came home to Norwich, after the first term or the first session of his student life at York, and in the zeal of his new purpose to be utterly devoted to the work of the ministry, took part with others, of kindred spirit, in the establishment of a Sunday-school in connection with the Octagon Chapel. This is now an oft-told tale, and the great traditions of the school are known and honoured, and with them the memory of other faithful workers and the names of Dowson, MOTTRAM, BOLINGBROKE, MADGE, WADE, FREEMAN, STEVENS, and many another. The boys' and the girls' school both have done for generations admirable work, and they are to-day alive with a strenuous and eager purpose, and the life of the congregation is largely wrapt up in the schools, and in the other helpful work associated with them, into which a great band of young people, who hold the promise of the future, full of zeal and hope, are being drawn. But now these schools, and this social work of brotherly helpfulness, the mark of a living church, require a fitting home, and unless it is secured, the promise of the future may be sadly disappointed. What more natural than that into this grateful commemoration of a great life should be brought this thought, instinct with his faith, very near to the deepest sympathies of his heart, of the MARTINEAU Memorial Hall and Schools?"

And a year earlier, in THE INQUIRER of April 23, 1904, having told for the first time of the proposed Memorial and of the needs of the school and congregation, we said:—

"We cannot doubt that Dr. MARTINEAU himself would have ardently welcomed such an opportunity to strengthen the good work, which he had so much at heart, in the city of his birth; and when this appeal is brought before the notice of the generous supporters of our churches, who have the means to give largely, where there is need, we trust that they will realise not only the significance of the occasion, to honour a venerated memory, but may rejoice to be thus associated with his spirit of faith and earnest service, in a great work of practical helpfulness."

Hope has been deferred for more than a year after the Centenary; yet we will recall also what we wrote on the eve of that celebration, in THE INQUIRER of March 4, 1905. We told then of the purchase of the site and of what more was required for the buildings, and added:—

"This is far beyond the unaided powers of the congregation, and can only be accomplished by the cordial and generous co-operation of many friends. This has been already recognised in the purchase of the site, and we would venture once more to express the earnest hope that this idea of a Norwich Memorial may kindle the faith and the imagination of our people, as a thing in which all should heartily and thankfully unite. It is not only that we desire to make this visible Memorial of our great Teacher worthy of the occasion, unpretentious indeed, yet noble and beautiful among buildings dedicated to such high ends, but that we are also to strengthen the work and the testimony of our faith in one of our historic chapels, in the chief city of a great province, on which far more depends than the prosperity of one congregation. Without a few really great gifts, such as generous hearts and ample means can give, we fear the end so ardently desired cannot be attained; but with these, and with a general response from the members of our churches and other friends throughout the country, and as we will dare to hope from friends in other countries also, our faith will be justified, and a memorial to JAMES MARTINEAU will be raised in his native city, worthy of the great name we seek to honour, and adequate to the needs and the growing possibilities of a religious work, true to his spirit, and identified with the most cherished interests and affections of his life."

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

SIR,—Many of your readers, being subscribers to the Norwich Martineau Memorial Building Fund, will no doubt be interested to hear of its progress to date, and to see the perspective drawing of the proposed buildings which accompanies the present issue of THE INQUIRER.

The plans have been prepared in consultation with Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, during many months of most careful consideration, eliminating to the utmost all superfluities, and reducing to a minimum even the needs to be supplied by these buildings.

The lowest tender for their erection comes out at £1,183. This sum includes heating and lighting, but not architect's fees.

In addition to this it will be necessary to put into repair, for letting purposes, the two remaining houses on the property, the cost of which is estimated at about £256; and to provide furniture for the new buildings at a similar figure; so that a total of £4,683, plus architect's fees, is required to complete the scheme. Against this sum the total present amount of subscriptions, paid or promised, is £2,880. We are thus altogether about £1,800 short of the sum required. The question then remains, Can we, having now everything in readiness to begin our much-needed Memorial Buildings, commence them in face of so large a debt? The appeal has, so far, taken just three years; it is with difficulty we have kept the Sunday-schools going during that time; and every week of delay in providing the new accommodation not only prolongs the difficulty, but means also risk of losing scholars. We are, therefore, most anxious to make a beginning early in the New Year.

Our congregation has done, and is doing, its utmost, and is willing to undertake to raise another £500 in addition to that already raised by them and included in the foregoing estimate. But that still leaves us with £1,300 to raise from outside.

Under these circumstances we venture to think that this candid statement of our position may move some of those friends who have already helped so generously, as well as some who have not yet responded, to provide the remaining sum of £1,300.

It will be remembered that Mrs. Russell Martineau and Mr. Frederick Nettlefold have already promised an additional £100 each, on condition that the whole amount needed is raised. These sums are included provisionally in the £2,880 named above.

May I, in conclusion, ask those who have kindly promised contributions to be so good as to send them to me at their convenience?

(Mrs.) F. A. MOTTRAM,

Hon. Sec. to the Martineau Memorial Fund (on behalf of the Octagon Chapel Committee).

ADVENT ADDRESSES.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

II.—THE ROMAN:

"I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also."—ROM. i. 15.

LAST Sunday I spoke of the relation of the Gospel to the religion of the Greeks. That religion I said, in its higher aspects, was a worship of reason and beauty, that it was the faith of a people with a genius for philosophy and art, that it was a faith which contributed not a little to Christianity, as we may see, for instance, in the Fourth Gospel, and in very important ways benefited the Church. But it had to yield to Christianity for the following reasons:

(1) It was too unstable, too theoretic, to give men peace and strength. It did not sufficiently lay hold on the eternal truth and steadiness of things. (2) It gave men a philosophy, while Christianity gave them a revelation. The Greek thinker discovered God, made his way to Him by the slow and laborious methods of reasoning; the Christian teacher, like the Hebrew prophet, knew God by the intuitions of the conscience and the spirit, and knew at the same time that God knew him. If the Greek intelligence discovered God, to the Christian conscience God disclosed Himself. (3) The Greek was ever tempted to put culture above righteousness, to take life philosophically or artistically rather than as a solemn duty. (4) Consequently, we find among the Greeks an inadequate sense of sin. They were more troubled at being stupid or tasteless or ungentlemanly than at being wicked—angry with themselves for their want of sense or good breeding rather than their injustice, envy, impurity, or uncharitableness. (5) They had a very imperfect conception of suffering and self-sacrifice. The great secret of the Cross was, for the most part, foolishness to them. (6) They believed in slavery, held the abominable doctrine that the culture and refinement of the few was only possible through the servitude of the many. (7) Lastly, as a natural result of the foregoing—of wandering desires and theories, the predominance of the understanding over the conscience and the affections, and imperfect conceptions of sin and pain and self-denial—they had a very weak faith in immortality. Too little acquainted with the eternal qualities of love and duty, they had small belief in eternity. A future life seemed to them, as it always must to men who have not felt the unfathomable depths of the Spirit, too good to be true. The Christian interpretation of things is just the reverse of this. It declares that if we only sufficiently realise life, what it is and what it means, we shall see that nothing can be too good to be true.

This evening I will speak of the religion of the Romans. First I will say something of the relationship of the Roman faith to the Greek; and then, perceiving to some extent why the Roman temperament and way of life proved stronger than those of Greece, we shall be prepared, perhaps, for the triumph of the Gospel over Roman Stoicism.

In the time of Christ Greece was a part of the Roman Empire. The brave and brilliant people, famous for all time for its capture of Troy, its repulse of the Persian hosts, and its conquest of Asia as far as the Indus, had yielded before the steady march of the legions, and suffered its romantic territory to be annexed by Rome. The land of Homer and Miltiades, Pericles and Alexander, paid tribute to the Cæsars. Though Greece in a striking manner avenged herself on her conqueror by spreading her language and thought and taste into the very heart of the Empire, Rome was her master. Her intelligence and resourcefulness were no match for the Roman discipline. The conquest of the gifted Greek by the plodding Roman is probably the most significant illustration in history of the superiority, in the long run, of perseverance over talent, of morality over intellectual genius.

As I have said, the Greeks had brains and sensibility. There never was a race with a more cultivated or refined spirit. Not only do the immortal remains of their art and poetry and philosophy prove this, but their language and its influence to the present day are evidence of it. When men of European stock desire to impress any peculiarly abstract or discriminating thought they generally employ Greek terminology. Some of our most modern inventions, such as the bicycle, the telegraph, and telephone bear names derived from the Greek. Compared with the Greek, the Roman was slow and stupid, blunt and rude and "Philistine." He borrowed his philosophy, drama, sculpture, and, to a large extent, his architecture from his quick-witted and artistic neighbour. He almost completely surrendered himself in matters of culture to his captive. But for all that he was the better man. He had the higher and stronger character. And in consequence, though this also was largely borrowed from the Greek, he had the nobler religion.

The word religion is Roman, and by its derivation marks the peculiar strength and nobleness of the Roman mind. It means much the same as obligation, and denotes what is binding on men. The lig in both words is akin to the word lex, or law, which is also in the word ligature, or bandage. The faith of the Roman was associated with promises and vows and responsibilities, with the bindingness of one's word or undertaking, and always was closely connected with discipline and government. Instead of being, like the Greek religion, a worship of the reasonable and the beautiful, it was primarily moral in its origin and utterance.

Hence the Romans, instead of being the thinkers and poets and artists of the ancient world, were its legislators and rulers. The Roman law in the time of Jesus Christ was the wisest and most universally respected among the then known civilised nations. It stretched from the Atlantic to the borders of India. Pilate governed Judea. He hesitated to pass an unjust sentence, and withstood for a time the passionate clamours of the Jews. The later governor, Festus, when St. Paul was charged before him, acknowledged his right, when he appealed to Cæsar, to be taken for trial to Rome. And the Apostle, having claimed to be brought before the Emperor, to Rome he had to go. At Ephesus, also, when the silversmith Demetrius stirred up a tumult against St. Paul on the ground that his teaching would injure the trade of the craftsmen who made shrines for the goddess Diana, the town clerk quieted the people by reminding them that the Roman law was open to them, and that a breach of the peace would be punished. At Jerusalem the Roman tribune, Claudius Lysias, sent a body of soldiers to rescue St. Paul from the Sanhedrin and bring him for safety into the castle. Notwithstanding much corruption, the Roman rule was a blessing in Europe and Asia: It was the fairest at that time, and ever since the jurisprudence of the Western nations has been practically based upon it. A Roman writer spoke the truth when he declared: "It is for others to work bronze into breathing form; others may be more eloquent, or may describe the circling movements of the heavens, and tell the rising of the stars; but thy work, O Roman, is to rule the nations: These be thine acts: To impose the conditions of the world's peace, to show mercy to the fallen, and to crush the proud."* He was right. It was the destiny of Rome to organise and to civilise, and to keep the peace among the petty warring States. She made roads through inaccessible forests, built bridges across the rivers, drained the fens and swamps, brought fresh water from the mountains to thirsty fields and cities in mighty aqueducts. She promoted trade and intercourse, and broke down prejudice. The forum, or market-place, which she established in the towns under her jurisdiction was a potent factor in the extension of commerce and the maintenance of peace. And the life of these various humanising agencies was the Roman sense of obligation. Bindingness was the secret of the whole.

Then there was the private aspect of the same quality. Besides his duty and service to the State there was the Roman's allegiance and loyalty to his home. He was distinguished, especially in the best days of the Republic, by his devotion to his father, wife, and child. He felt the obligations of being a son, a husband, and a parent. I have reminded you that the word "religion" is Roman: The word piety is also Roman, and it denoted, in the first instance, dutifulness to father and mother. Obedience to the laws of the household was a preparation for reverence for the will of the gods. In consequence, also, of this fidelity to the home, the Roman woman occupied a much more honourable place than the Greek: The famous women of Greece are often the concubine; those of Roman history and legend are the matron—the devoted, dignified wife or mother. Shakespeare is absolutely truthful when he represents in "Coriolanus" the conflict of love for home with pride in war, and the victory in his nature of the son and husband over the warrior.

We may say, then, that the Roman religion was a worship of authority in the home and in the State—a worship of Lares and Penates on the one hand and of deified rulers on the other. Every good household had its altar and guardian deities; every patriotic soldier and citizen bowed down to the image of the Emperor as the symbol of beneficent government. It is significant that in dealing with the quarrelsome and contentious Jews of his age, Jesus Christ bade them "render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, and unto God the things that were God's."² If our Lord had had anything but a lofty opinion of the Roman rule, he could not have spoken in these terms:

Such, at any rate, was the popular faith. Among the educated, those who, chiefly through the influence of Greek philosophy, had outgrown the polytheistic features of the popular belief, the worship of law and order took the shape of Stoicism. Men like Seneca and Marcus Aurelius looked up to God as the union and perfection of all that was lawful and orderly—self-loyalty, self-mastery, self-containment; and in the effort to be God-like they cultivated the same self-possession and regulation. Two words have come down to us from Stoicism which are sufficiently indicative of its high and strong qualities. The first, as Robertson has reminded us, is Virtue, which means manliness: To be a man was to be virtuous, to have virtue was to be manly. All softness, indulgence, effeminacy, all shrinking from danger or the truth, were marks of want of manhood. "To play the man," as Stevenson so often says, would be the motto of a Stoic. The second word is Gravity, or seriousness: The educated Roman despised the light-hearted, volatile, quick-tongued Greek. He believed in the virtue of holding his tongue, of weighing his words and counting the cost of his actions: He hated the thought of being precipitate, impulsive, demonstrative: He was often a solemn, rather heavy fellow, stolid as well as solid, but a quiet, powerful, impressive person. In fact, Stoicism was in a number of ways the noblest religion before Christianity, and it not unfrequently passed into Christianity when the two fairly met. Unfortunately, Stoicism was almost entirely confined to the cultured classes, and Christianity at this period was, to a large extent, limited to humble people, and thus they kept apart. It is a melancholy thought, one of the bitter disappointments of history, that Marcus Aurelius never read the words of Christ: One keenly wonders, with Matthew Arnold, what the beautiful, sad-minded author of the "Meditations" would have said of the "Sermon on the Mount" and the discourses in the "Gospel according to St. John."

Jesus himself and St. Paul made, it is obvious, a strong impression on the Romans: They offered something for which the true Roman was already prepared. Professor Dill says: "All over the world, down to the very end, you find specimens of the high-principled, modest, strenuous Roman officer, doing dangerous work faithfully on remote frontiers without the hope of fame or reward."² The first heathen of whom we read in the Gospels that he acknowledged Christ was the centurion of Capernaum. The Jews said of him, "He loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue." He saw in Jesus the authority he respected, the authority, not of office, like that of the Scribes and Pharisees, but of supremely noble manliness, the manliness which becomes supermanliness in a God-touched and God-inspired genius. Another centurion who yielded him his homage was the officer in charge of the crucifixion, who was heard to say when the hideous business was over, "Truly, this was a righteous man." There is a kinship between the Roman sense of duty and the sacrifice of the Cross. St. Paul's message of the crucified Redeemer had great influence among Roman soldiers. While a prisoner in Rome he converted, he tells us, the whole Pretorian guard. It is perfectly intelligible. The Roman soldier's first and last thought was duty—to do his duty by those who were set over him and to those who were set under him; to devote himself, not to what he liked or fancied, but to what had to be done whether he wanted to do it or not. This is the character which makes a good legionary and a good Christian too. If we are undisciplined and unruly, wayward, and self-willed we shall not understand Christ nor the government of God in the earth and the heavens: Without order within us we must fail to perceive the Divine order all about us. And because the good Roman knew the truth and the blessing of discipline, he yielded to the nobler discipline and grander allegiance of the Gospel.

For Christianity was far superior to Stoicism. It had and has four qualities which Stoicism usually lacked. Firstly, gentleness. The Stoics were righteous, but often stern: They were men of iron will rather than of sympathy. Their grim self-mastery and dignified bearing repelled rather than attracted weak and suffering natures. Of course, I am speaking in general terms. As a rule the Stoic was not the friend of sinners. Secondly, the Stoic wanted lowliness. He was apt to be a little proud of his virtue: He was strong, but self-strong, not God-strong. His own righteousness was not swallowed up in a greater righteousness. He knew that he could do much by his own exertions: He never said "I can do all things through Him that strengtheneth me." The difference is, as has been said, between clenching one's own fist in the dark, and grasping a Divine Comrade by the hand. Thirdly, Stoicism lacked joy: It was not a message of glad news. The Stoic never seemed to find in God what was altogether worthy of human nature. God to him was too much law, too impersonal, too devoid of freedom, grace, mercy, and forgiveness. God was, in his eyes, too much committed to a rigid course of reason and justice in His dealings with the world and the individual soul. There was absolutely no room for miracle in the Stoic conception of the universe, whereas it is full of miracles, not perhaps as used to be thought, but in a deeper, spiritual sense: God is perpetually working miracles of grace on men's souls. His relation to us is not merely that of an Infinite Legislator: He is life, and therefore liberty, confined within the limits of His creative energy, but also unconfined in the boundless realm of His love and joy. And the moment we recognise this, that God the Father is; as we are, a Free Spirit, we escape from the imprisoning chain of mere system. Therefore St. Paul was glad. He said, "Rejoice, and again I say, rejoice."

Lastly, Stoicism was not democratic. It did not appeal to the poor and simple. It did not offer any challenge to slavery. But Christianity was a glad-tiding to all—to the ignorant and the oppressed as well as the learned and the fortunate. Outcast men and women and children lifted up their heads when they heard of the kindness of Heaven, as they came to see the Father in the image not of the Emperor, but of Jesus. The slave on the estate, the shepherd in the wild mountains, the sailor chained to the oar in the galleys, the sick and starving wretches left to perish in the streets or without the city walls, were comforted, were assured that they were not worthless, but that God cared for them, that they were God's children, with immortal souls. Though sinful, they had a Father who would forgive. Though they were poor, they were rich. If they suffered pain and anguish it was but a light affliction for the moment. If they were homeless they had an Eternal City in the heavens not made with hands.

Ah, men speak as if the Gospel had had its day. Rather its day has scarcely begun to dawn. The darkness and sadness of heathendom are still upon us. Our religion is often far more a stern Stoicism than the teaching of Jesus, and Christ is frequently less than Cæsar. Who will say what the world will be when the Cross has at last triumphed over the Eagle?

THE DREAMER.

THEY say of you, "Behold once more
This dreamer cometh, as of yore!

Folly is in his rebel heart,
And Error goes his feet before.

Come, let us smite and cast him out,
Whose words our order'd systems flout;

Lest, caught by his distracted brain,
Mankind should fall on fear and doubt."

Nay, keep thy spirit calm within,
Nor count this unto them for sin,

Who never saw the light you see,
Nor yearn'd for treasures Truth must win.
Change not, though wrath move foes or friends,

The goal to which your impulse tends.

Where Persecution stones the saints,
Hope, like a heavenly dove, descends.

FRIENDS who have valued the teaching of the late Dr. A. W. Momerie will be glad to have the words of the inscription on the memorial tablet placed last year in the chapel of St. John's College, at Cambridge: "In Memoriam Alfred Williams Momerie, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D. Born 1848. Died 1900. Sometime Fellow of St. John's College. Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in King's College, London, and Morning Preacher at the Foundling Hospital, London. Endowed with brilliant gifts of Thought and Speech, he used them in the service of others, and, with a brave consistency, witnessed to the Truth of God."

UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

A SERIES of meetings was held in Manchester on Wednesday to celebrate the first anniversary of the Van Mission. There was a good gathering of missionaries in the morning for the purpose of comparing experiences, and much helpful conversation took place. In the afternoon a public conference was held, when subscribers and friends availed themselves of the invitation to be present.

The Rev. J. CHANNING POLLARD (President of the Missionary Conference) occupied the chair. A letter expressive of gratitude for opportunity of sharing in the work of the Mission was read from Mrs. Bayle Bernard, the donor of the first van. Mr. J. R. Beard had also written expressing his joy in this fresh evidence of the missionary zeal of the young ministers.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING read extracts from the report. He emphasised the special work of the Mission as appealing to a class not reached by lectures in halls. It was not sought to establish new churches, but to liberalise thought, to help lonely co-religionists, and to prepare the way for future opportunities.

FIRST ANNUAL MEETING.

The report, which was printed and circulated beforehand, is a sixteen page pamphlet, and should be procured and studied by all who are interested in this new movement. It recounts in detail those particulars of the Mission which Mr. Spedding gave at the Council meeting of the B. and F. U. A., reported in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 3, and in letters which appeared Oct. 13 and Nov. 17. A warm tribute is paid to Mr. Bertram Talbot for his services throughout the mission in charge of the van, and the committee record with much satisfaction that they have been able to retain his services permanently for the future. As to the results, the report says:—

"The Mission from the outset disclaimed any idea of seeking to establish new churches. A Unitarian place of worship is not everywhere essential to the dissemination of our views. If it were, the outlook would often seem hopeless, but it is a good thing that the truth we hold should be told everywhere, whether it lead to the gathering of congregations of Unitarians or not. Men will be the better for hearing this good news. If the Missioners have not primarily sought to make converts, friends have been made wherever services have been held, and it would be unwise to disregard unmistakable interest and sympathy and to leave favourable ground neglected. The Mission has, therefore, reported upon its work in various places, leaving to the district societies the responsibility for any further steps." In consequence of these representations, the Yorkshire Union has arranged for courses of lectures at Skipton and Shipley. Offers of closer co-operation have also come from the Central Postal Mission and the local Postal Missions in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and plans are being considered as to the manner in which this co-operation can be made most effective. "In Manchester a winter mission is being arranged with the assistance of a number of the churches. A Joint Committee representing the Association of Churches, the Home Missionary College, the Lay Preachers' Union, and the Van Mission, has been formed to carry on this work. Other results may be inferred from the details of this report. It is impossible that all these meetings should have been held without leaving some good impression. Of this there is abundant evidence. Misrepresentations have been exposed, ignorance has been dispelled, hostile criticism disarmed, and genuine appreciation of Unitarianism spontaneously expressed by persons who had never heard of, or understood, it before. Looking nearer home, the Committee has reason to believe that the Mission has contributed in some degree to that spirit of greater faith and hopefulness which has seemed to pervade the Unitarian summer gatherings."

The accounts show the cost of the van and its equipment to have been £130 17s., its expenses in the field during the 163 days' mission £92 11s. 1d., with £18 14s. 11½d. for organisation, and £14 7s. 11½d. special expenses for books, &c., a total of £125 14s., giving an average of 15s. 5d. a day. The receipts, including £21 17s. 0½d. from Van offertories and sales of literature, amounted to £292 14s. 1½d., leaving a balance of £36 3 1½d. in hand.

The Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES (Bradford) moved the adoption of the report. It was, he said, one of the best and most cheering reports ever presented to a Unitarian meeting. There was not a wail of despair or a note of self-criticism in it, but it was a good soulful report. It had been one of the best bits of work since the battle of Waterloo, a date which he adopted because Richard Wright, our most famous missionary of the old days, was then in the field. He had seen much of the work, having presided at seventeen meetings. They were all an unqualified success, and left a profound impression on the minds of all the audiences. It was a great joy to find so many men of the true apostolic spirit among them. He could not have believed there were men of such power, and ability also, as the missionaries had proved themselves to be. In conclusion, he emphasised the good the work had been to our own churches. Never in his experience had he seen his own church so moved and so enthusiastic as over this work.

The Rev. H. BODELL SMITH seconded the report. He had seen much of the Mission. He had, however, seen none of the antagonistic spirit nor a single regrettable incident. As an old campaigner in open-air meetings he was struck by the audiences which assembled. There was little of the movement, the coming and going usually observed at open-air meetings, but people stayed and listened as those who were hearing the good news of a real Gospel.

Mr. T. F. ROBINSON (President of the Manchester District Association) expressed his pleasure that at last they had got away from discussions of name to the things they all believed in. He was glad also they had now got to up-to-date methods.

Mrs. CEREDIG JONES, in an earnest address, suggested the question as to whether the mission had not been conducted on too sectarian lines. The hymns were chosen because they were by Unitarians, not for their suitability, while the literature distributed was nearly all of a theological and controversial, rather than religious character. Such addresses as she heard were also disproportionately devoted to controversy. She wished they would exclude all controversy, and they could do so, because if others attacked them there was no need for them to reply.

The Rev. A. DOLPHIN urged that the theological side could not be avoided. People came not only to hear but also to ask questions, and all such questions showed how anxiously people were seeking light on theological questions. These expressions were supported by the Revs. J. M. Mills, W. R. Shanks, R. P. Farley and others, and the report was adopted.

The Rev. J. M. BASS read the balance-sheet and made the welcome announcement that the cost of a fourth van had now been guaranteed, in addition to large contributions towards working expenses. About £200 further would cover the anticipated expenses of the four vans during the coming season, and for this he appealed.

The Rev. W. E. ATTACK moved the adoption of the balance-sheet and it was carried.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. T. P. Spedding and Mr. B. Talbot for all their services to the Mission. He had, he said, more hope for our churches now that the young men were dropping their respectability and going out into the open air. The time had fully come to unbend, to go out to seek and to save. In going out they went in the spirit, if not with quite the word, of General Booth. The different word was necessary because the old doctrines were in the way of real Christian life, and the removal of them would open the way to bring the spirit of Christ into life. He was proud of Mr. Spedding as a Cheshire man, and welcomed Mr. Talbot, of whose earnestness and spirit he had heard such excellent accounts.

The Rev. C. ROPER, in seconding, said this was not the first bit of good work the Missionary Conference had done. There were churches in the North which the Conference had founded, and other churches would come out of the present movement if followed up in the way a National Society could do. The resolution was passed with great enthusiasm.

Mr. B. TALBOT, in responding, said he had had great joy in the work and had made many new friendships which had enriched his life. The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING also returned thanks. He was grateful for their kind appreciation, but he had only done as had many others—his best for the common cause. He moved that a message of respectful greeting should be sent to the lady whose faith in providing funds for the first van had made the work possible. The name of Mrs. Bayle Bernard would always be associated with the first van, and he hoped the whole mission would also always preserve her large spirit of Christian faith and love. The motion was carried with acclamation, and the meeting adjourned for tea.

EVENING MEETING.

A public meeting was held in the evening, when the places of many who had had to return home were more than filled up by the local friends of the Mission. The Rev. J. CHANNING POLLARD again presided, and in a rousing speech set the note of thankfulness and confidence which all the subsequent speakers proceeded to re-echo. As a plan of operations a novel scheme had been adopted. There were twelve speakers, and to them had been given as texts sentences the initial letters of which formed the words "Unitarian Van." For this use of the acrostic, one speaker urged high sanction and precedent in the Book of Psalms. If further sanction were needed, it was afforded in the series of short, bright, earnest speeches which it produced. The meeting was frequently lifted to quite new heights of enthusiasm, and everyone present felt the moving of a living spirit in their midst. All the speeches, whatever the text, affirmed the positive religious character of the Mission, which, as Mr. Rossington urged, was the sole explanation of its success. But while all felt the truth of this, no less clear was the repeated declaration, always warmly cheered, that the human agency in this new apostolate, the genius to conceive, and the patience to execute, was the Rev. T. P. Spedding. His labours had been untiring, his judgment sure, and his administrative ability sound.

It is impossible to add more now beyond the bare list of speakers with their respective texts. They were as follows, viz.:—The Rev. H. B. Smith, "Unitarianism"; Principal Gordon, "A Needed Mission"; the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, "An Intellectual Appeal"; the Rev. W. R. Shanks, "A Theistic Mission"; Mr. T. F. Robinson, "Affirmative"; the Rev. H. J. Rossington, "Religious"; the Rev. J. A. Pearson, "Inspiring"; the Rev. J. M. Mills, "Acceptable"; Mr. Richard Robinson, "Non-contentious"; the Rev. C. Peach, "Veracious"; the Rev. C. Harvey-Cooke, "Apostolic"; the Rev. C. Roper, "National."

The meeting closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

LOVE AND DEATH.

Love is of God ! and yet sometimes,
We know not why, He deems it well
To take our dear ones from our sight
And leave us weeping in the night.

Love is of God ! there is no crime
In sobbing breath at funeral knell.
From Him the love so strong and deep
From Him the love that bids us weep.

Love is of God ! and yet He saith "Give back the child that is so dear !
Loose clinging hands and let him go !
Man's fault or not, it must be so !"

Love is of God ! but so is Death.
What is it, Daughter, that you fear ?
Love on Death's wings may rise above
And reach the very home of Love.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS

SHORTLY after I wrote to you in February last the members and friends of the Midland Christian Union hold their annual meeting at the Old Meeting Church in Birmingham. (See INQUIRER, March 17.) The report of the Executive Committee of the Priestley Centenary Celebration was presented, and has since been printed with the report of the Union. I do not intend to write more upon this subject, which has recently occupied so much of the time and attention of our friends in this district, except to emphasise the fact that nearly two years have already passed away since the bazaar was held and the greater part of the Centenary Fund was raised. Bearing this in mind, it seems to me that if the fund is utilised to the greatest advantage the present and succeeding years should be rich with a full harvest of religious activity among those of our churches which the fund was specially intended to benefit. Exactly forty years ago last March 27 the Midland Christian Union was formed upon the nucleus of two other societies of a similar kind, one of which, the Warwickshire Unitarian Tract Society, would have reached its centenary had it continued till June of this year. During all those years I know of no fund having been raised such as that we have lately succeeded in getting together, and having obtained the money it behoves us to see that it is judiciously expended.

No event of special interest in the life of the churches included in this district occurs to me as I write, except that one of our churches in Birmingham has been recently advertising in your columns for a salaried superintendent for the girls' Sunday School. This is somewhat significant of the conditions prevailing at that church, and I hope it is only a temporary expedient. Are we going back to the early days of Sunday Schools, when the teachers were paid for their services ? A century ago three shillings a Sunday was the usual pay in Birmingham.

Some of our chapels are still without ministers, and some of the pulpits that were vacant in February are occupied now. Progress in the "promotion of religion" is slow, even if there be any progress at all. (The words in inverted commas constitute the aim and object of the Union.) Churches generally seem to be waking up to the fact that they are not making progress in reaching the masses of the people, and even Bishops are beginning to be uneasy as to the condition of the Church of England in this respect. Plain words have been written and spoken on this subject during the last few months, such words as cannot be lightly passed over by thoughtful people: Some think that improvement lies in the direction of a union of the various denominations, uniting them into one harmonious whole, as witness the articles on "Union and Breadth," by Sir Oliver Lodge, and "Reunion," by the Rev. D. Macfayden, in the last number of the Hibbert Journal. The editor of that journal has also given us a good deal to think about in his outspoken utterances at Oxford last April on "The Outlook for Liberal Religion," and in the last number of his journal on "Church and World." Sir Oliver Lodge would evidently prefer comprehension to disestablishment; but I, for one, think that the latter course will be the only effectual one, and that there will be no possibility of union with the Church of England so long as she is by law established.

Mr. Macfayden's article is of great interest to those whom it concerns; but as he deals merely with the orthodox and so-called Evangelical Churches, not including the Anglican, I cannot see how it affects us in any way. On this subject what happened more than two centuries ago must not be forgotten. One of our ministers has recalled the incident in the following words: "At the Restoration the last chance of having a real Church of England embracing the nation at large was wilfully and cruelly thrown away, and Black Bartholomew's Day, 1662, saw non-conformity rendered a permanent necessity by the expulsion of nearly two thousand conscientious clergymen from the pulpits of the Established Church."

The editor of the Hibbert Journal points out some of the causes which keep the people outside the organised churches of the land. One of these arises from the different standards of truth held by the church and the world. He says: "The habit of professional belief in religion is loose, vague, equivocal; The habit of science is straightforward, exacting, uncompromising, direct. Therefore the conscience of mankind is on the side of science." Surely a very grave indictment! At Oxford he pointed out what, in his opinion, were two of the causes which seemed to be retarding the work of our own churches and of others: The first is the overburden of establishments in the shape of property to manage, fabrics to maintain, institutions to keep up, money to provide, committees to attend, &c.; and the second, an excessive concern for the theological apparatus. He alludes to our domestic missions which have been free from aggressive theological propaganda, and which, in his opinion, constitute the most important and successful part of our work. And is this not true with regard to our domestic missions in Birmingham at the present hour? Are they not—and there are three of them in active living operation—the most successful of any of our religious institutions in the city? He closes a paper of unusual interest with giving expression to an idea which he conceived some years ago, that our ministers would some day belong to a preaching brotherhood, doing the work of evangelists "untrammelled by the conventional apparatus of a church," and this he thinks we shall ultimately come to.

Not many weeks ago two of our Bishops spoke out in a striking manner at the meeting of the Church Congress at Barrow. One of them, Dr. Gore, deplored the ineffectiveness of the church's appeal to the masses of the people, and attributed the failure to the fact that the church had become the church of the rich rather than that of the poor, the church of capital rather than that of labour. The other Bishop, Dr. Diggle, explained the very small attendances at the services by saying that it was due to the lack of intellectual progress, and that the church had become stereotyped. These again are very serious statements made by leading men in their own church. True, that in Birmingham the Church of England has shown increased activity of late years, and the Bishop of Birmingham is now one of the leaders in the public life of the city. Indeed, the State Church seems to be taking the position in the city which was formerly held by the Nonconformists. The Bishop is a striking personality. He works very hard and does not spare himself. The cathedral church draws crowded congregations every Sunday, and sometimes on week-days. A succession of Bishops are announced to preach at the Parish Church for several Sundays, beginning with this afternoon, when a new organ is being opened, and the new Lord Mayor (a Unitarian) and other prominent citizens will be present at the opening ceremony.

An Episcopalian minister of Boston, U.S.A. (the Rev. Dr. Worcester) is of opinion that if the church is ever to recover lost ground, and to retain and gain the faith of mankind, she can only do so by following the example and obeying the will of her Master. He says: "The object on which his (the Master's) eye rested was not the church, but the salvation of the world." Further, the same writer says: "If we wish to hold our congregations and to command their enthusiasm, their wealth, and to develop their Christian character, we must give them much to do." And he quotes the saying of some of the most successful rectors, that their only real congregations are their workers. The rest of this thoughtful and eloquent paper may be found in the Seed Sower for October.

It is instructive to read the Provincial Letters which have appeared in your columns during the last two months. Reference is made in nearly all of them to the great success of the "Van" movement, which is something new in our denomination. Those who have engaged in the work are convinced that there are thousands living in places remote from our churches who would welcome our ministry if we could only get into contact with them, and that this can be done through such agencies as the Postal and Van Missions. Surely Mr. Jacks' idea of the preaching brotherhood has already begun to be realised in this Van movement. A reference in the first annual report of the movement, just issued, reminds me that the Birmingham Postal Mission no longer exists. It rendered invaluable service to our cause in a quiet way for several years, and ought certainly to be revived. Cannot the Union find some capable and energetic person to take up the duties of Secretary? And are we also going to have our Van Mission? If our methods in the past have not yielded satisfactory results is it not time to change them for others? I am inclined to agree with Mr. Jacks that the time has come to seriously consider whether the traditional mechanism of church life is always essential to the work of the church; nay, whether it is not sometimes more of a hindrance than a help. There are twenty-three churches in the Union, and if we calmly reflect upon their present condition and try to realise the extent of what each one is actually doing in its own sphere of labour towards the "promotion of religion," shall we not find that, with very few exceptions, they all want life and want it "more abundantly"? H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from the Mansford-street Parsonage, Bethnal Green, E.:—"May I make an earnest appeal to your readers for subscriptions to our various funds? There was not such a large response as I had hoped for to the appeal I made in your columns in the summer for our country holiday fund. Perhaps I was too sanguine, but I was anxious to help many of our people here to enjoy at least a week in the country, so sent them away, hoping the money would be forthcoming. The expenses, too, of our annual excursions are rather heavy, and have to be met out of this fund. There is therefore a deficit which I should like to clear off before the close of the year. Then there is the Poor's Purse, which some of your readers help to fill at this time of the year. Contributions to this are always acceptable; the more funds at my disposal the more can I help deserving cases which come to my notice during the year. And in addition there is the special Christmas fund, which enables me to brighten the lives of some of our mission folk at Christmas time, which should be a time of joy and happiness for all. Will your readers help by sending donations to these various funds?"

Manchester Domestic Mission.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop, of the Willert-street Mission, writes:—"Friends in past years have helped to make Christmastide brighter for our scholars and the large number of poor people we have to deal with at this centre, and I venture to again ask their assistance. On Christmas Day we gather all our scholars together, when, after a tea, we distribute toys, books and clothing, according to need and the assistance rendered. We are hoping that this appeal will meet with a generous response because, apart from a large school, we have a great number of very poor folk to whom we have for some years past been able to dispense some of the joys which Christmas brings to most of us. Toys, clothing, and money will be thankfully received by Rev. J. W. Bishop, Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst; or, 156, Smedley-road, Cheetham."

Boston.—The pulpit of Spain-lane Chapel last Sunday was occupied both morning and evening by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, of London, who spoke in the evening to a full and very appreciative congregation on "International Friendship."

Chesterfield.—The annual school sermons were preached in Elder-yard Chapel last Sunday by the Rev. H. S. Taylor, of Mansfield. The chapel was well filled, and a band of scholars and teachers sung special hymns. The collections showed a gratifying increase on last year's. On Monday the congregational tea party was held at the school. The presence and cheerful speech of the Rev. H. E. Dowson added greatly to the enjoyment of the evening.

Darlington (Welcome Meeting).—Having for some years held together under difficult conditions, with no settled minister since 1889, the congregation on November 21 offered a very warm welcome to the Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., as their minister. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. E. Cox-Walker, who gave a pithy resumé of the history of the church, from its earliest days of struggle until now, when a wider prospect seemed to be again before it. The hon. secretary, Mr. James Mawson, read extracts from a number of letters from clergymen and ministers of the town, with apologies for absence and fraternal greetings and good wishes for minister and church; also from the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, and from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. A cordial welcome to Mr. Brettell, on behalf of the congregation was offered by Miss Lucas, and seconded by Mr. G. G. Armstrong, ministers and friends from neighbouring towns, included the Revs. R. H. Maister, G. Peaston, and Frank Walters, who, in a characteristic speech, congratulated minister and people on the bond just formed between them. A retired Primitive Methodist minister, in a pleasant and friendly manner expressed his good wishes for the church and its pastor, as did also the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead. Then the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton, who, after the close of his college course, had for two years ministered to the Darlington Church, recalled memories of the past, and spoke words of hope and encouragement for the future—paying a warm tribute of personal esteem to the friend of his college days, the new minister of the church. In feeling terms Mr. Brettell responded, saying he trusted that the arrangement just entered upon would ripen into closer and closer bonds between himself and the congregation, which it would be his privilege and pleasure to serve.

Doncaster.—The first of a series of five lectures on "Religious Beliefs as they are To-day" was given in the Central Hall, Monday, November 19, by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who took as his topic, "The Theology of the City Temple, i.e., the opinions of the Rev. R. J. Campbell." He quoted passages from several public declarations of Mr. Campbell, especially that entitled "The Changing Sanctions of Popular Theology," regarding traditional orthodox dogmas and the modifications requisite to make them acceptable to-day—such as the fall, the nature of sin, the function of the parable, eternal punishment, and the person of Christ. In the lecturer's opinion the statements proposed by Mr. Campbell are essentially theological propositions which have been accepted and proclaimed by Unitarians for about a century, though these statements have perhaps never been made in exactly identical terms. He then compared some utterances of Mr. Campbell with the dogmas of the Westminster Confession of Faith, belief in which is obligatory on the minister and the members of the City Temple, and touched on the question of casuistry involved in the preaching of heresy in a church solemnly consecrated to the strictest orthodox belief and worship.

Liverpool: Bond-street Mission.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Wednesday, November 21. Mrs. Alfred Booth took the chair, and gave an encouraging address. She congratulated the Rev. W. Reynolds and the congregation on the success of their efforts, remarking especially on the Thursday afternoon mothers' meeting, for which they were obliged to refuse further admissions to prevent over-crowding. She hoped the thirty or more young men who had recently joined the mission would realise God within themselves as Life and Wisdom and Love, and live accordingly. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers and Mr. John Hughes also spoke, the latter dwelling particularly on the increased attendance at the Sunday services.

London: Kilburn.—The Ladies' Congregational Working Party have during the past year been preparing for a sale of work with a view to raising a sum of money to augment the church's income. The weekly meetings that have been held have done much good in bringing the ladies together in a co-operative and friendly spirit, and all have heartily thrown themselves into the effort. The sale was opened on Friday, Nov. 23, by Mrs. Percy Preston, chairman the Rev. Charles Roper; and on Saturday by the Rev. Henry Gow, chairman Alderman C. Fleetwood Pritchard. There was an admirable display of useful and fancy articles, and friends from other churches came as buyers to help to make the effort a complete success. The amount realised, including the result of two concerts held early in the year, was about £145 after all expenses had been paid.

London Sunday School Society.—A social meeting of teachers and elder scholars was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, November 24. There was a very good attendance, the gallery as well as the body of the hall being almost full. Tea and coffee were served from 6 to 7, when the chair was taken by the Rev. John Toye, the President, who spoke a few words of welcome and encouragement, after which an enjoyable programme of music, recitations, and a sketch was given by a number of friends. Mr. John Harrison played the organ. There was an opening and a closing hymn, and the evening was concluded with the Benediction.

Maidstone.—The Rev. A. Farquharson is delivering Sunday evening discourses on "Modern Unitarianism," which are creating great and widespread interest in the town and district. The chapel is filled every Sunday, upstairs and down; and last Sunday chairs had again to be placed in the aisles. The Young Men's Society, conducted by the minister, which meets in the afternoon in the Archbishop's old palace, overlooking the river, is also flourishing. Theological and social subjects are discussed, and once a month the open conference brings an influx of visitors.

Manchester: Moss Side.—On Wednesday, Nov. 28, at the Unitarian Literary and Debating Society, a very instructive and interesting address on Woman's Suffrage was delivered by Miss Margaret Ashton, and the following resolution was adopted:—"That this meeting urges the Government to bring in a measure for the Parliamentary Enfranchisement of Women, on the same terms as it is or shall be granted to men."

Middlesbrough.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on November 18, when sermons were preached by the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, of Mansfield. The anniversary celebrations were continued on the following Wednesday, when a very successful tea and entertainment were held. The entertainment consisted of a cantata, entitled "To Santos Land with the Dream Man," given by the younger children; followed by Miss Pritchard's "Romance and Reality," by the elder girls. A farce, "The Ruling Passion," by some of the members of the senior class, concluded a very enjoyable programme. The entertainment was repeated on the Friday, and was again well attended.

Pontypridd (Resignation).—The Rev. Simon Jones, having accepted an invitation to Swansea, has resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian church, and will leave at the end of February next.

Richmond.—The ladies of the sewing meeting announce a sale of work to be held on Tuesday, December 11, at 3 p.m., at Lady Wilson's, 86, Church-road. Friends are urged to go and buy useful and fancy articles, pictures, and Christmas presents, and so help the Ormond-road Free Church.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday, November 25, services commemorating the 218th anniversary of the church were conducted with gratifying success by Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, of Plumstead. The congregations were much above the average, and Mr. Jones's discourses were highly appreciated. At the conversazione on Monday evening there was an excellent attendance. The choir, in the unavoidable absence of Ald. Green, was taken by Mr. W. J. Watson; and addresses were delivered by Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, S. S. Brettell (Darlington), and R. H. Maister, minister of the church. An excellent musical and elocutionary programme was rendered. At the weekly meetings of "Our Guild" interesting papers have been read, and an experimental "Children's Hour" is being held on each guild night, prior to the guild meeting proper, and promises to be a success.

Swansea (Appointment).—The Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., of Pontypridd, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the High-street Unitarian Church, in succession to the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, and will begin his ministry in March next.

Walthamstow.—The re-opening of the church, after renovation and opening of the new schoolroom by Lady Durning Lawrence, will take place at 4.30 on Saturday, Dec. 8; a public tea at 5 o'clock, and a public meeting at 7, when Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence will preside. On Sunday, Dec. 9, special services will be held, conducted in the morning at 11, by Principal Gordon, afternoon at 3, by Mr. Noel and Mr. Skelt, and in the evening at 6.30 by Principal Gordon. Collections on behalf of the Building Funds. Donations from friends who cannot attend these meetings may be sent to Miss Prosser, 66, Howard-road, Walthamstow.

Wolverhampton (Welcome Meeting).—A joint meeting of the Council of the Midland Christian Union and the Ministers' Monthly meeting was called to meet at Wolverhampton on Monday afternoon, Nov. 26, to hear and consider an address by the Rev. Dr. Ewart on "The Newer Christian Theology," and this was arranged in conjunction with the welcome meeting to the Rev. J. A. Shaw, M.A., as minister of All Souls' Church, which was held in the evening. After tea, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, President of the Midland Christian Union, took the chair, and the meeting, which was largely attended, was full of encouragement for the future of the congregation. The Rev. J. C. Street delivered an inspiring address and was followed by Councillor Evan Evans (President of the Church), Messrs. H. Rickett, W. L. Teasdale, Eric Mortimer (secretary), and the Revs. J. W. Austin, W. C. Hall, A. H. Shelley, G. L. Phelps, Dobson Bainbridge (Methodist New Connexion), and others.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—This Club was formally inaugurated at a meeting held on Saturday, Nov. 24, in the Priestley Hall, Leeds, Mr. Henry Lupton presiding over an attendance representative of several congregations in Leeds and District. It was resolved to hold three meetings a year, with tea (at 9d. per head) at each, the committee to have power to arrange for a dinner on special occasions. Mr. W. Skelton (Mill Hill) was elected president; Mr. John Hargreaves (Chapel-lane, Bradford), vice-president; Mr. F. G. Jackson (Mill Hill) treasurer; and Mr. A. Simpson (Mill Hill) hon. sec. A representative committee was also appointed. After tea Mr. E. O. Dodson (President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday-School Union) read a Paper on "The Church and the Social Problem," which was followed by discussion. The Church, he said, had nothing to do with party politics, but must uphold the principles of peace, righteousness, and public welfare. The difficulty was the application of these principles to the questions of the present day. It would seem that the duty of the Church lay in moulding public opinion, so that, when the principles were carried into legislation, they would carry with them the consent of the nation. The club now numbers about thirty members. Those wishing to join should send in their names and addresses, together with P.O. for subscription (minimum 1s. per annum) to Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield Mount, Beeston, Leeds, or to Mr. F. G. Jackson, 8, Park-lane, Leeds.

THE Christian Social Union did well to arrange the exhibition of leadless glaze china, held recently at the Church House, with the intention of proving that satisfactory cups and saucers, even of the finer and daintier qualities, can be produced without the use of any poisonous ingredient. Anybody who really wants leadless glaze can have it, if she is prepared to take a little trouble and pay a little higher price; for the finer sorts do cost about 10 per cent. more. Unfortunately, it is not everyone who will pay an extra 1d. or so in the 1s.; but some of the quite cheap ware is excellent and good to look upon. The real difficulty is that but few people will care about the question. Of course the use of lead under conditions which create disease ought to be prohibited, but there is little likelihood of that unless some international agreement can be arrived at. Meantime, we can but refer to the Report of the Inspectors of Factories, where the partly successful precautions are described; where also it can be seen that the health of girls and women is yearly being undermined in order that we may be able to buy fine china at a low price.

THIS, it seems to me, is the true use of the Heroic, of a life transcending life's ordinary possibilities; such a life is a direct call upon the soul, saying, "Friend, come up higher!" And the heart recognises its voice, exults in it, claims it as the voice of kindred risen to a more exalted sphere. It is like air from a mountain summit where we could not live, and yet it seems our native air, and braces us in every nerve.—Dora Greenwell.

'Tis the sublime of man,
Our noontide majesty, to know ourselves Parts and proportions of one wondrous whole! —Coleridge.

THE true end of poetry is to awaken men to the divine side of things, to bear witness to the beauty that clothes the outer world, the nobility that lies hid, often obscured, in human souls; to call forth sympathy for neglected truths, for noble but oppressed persons, for down-trodden causes; and to make men feel that through all outward beauty and all pure inward affection, God is addressing them.—J. C. Shairp.

By HERBERT RIX, B.A., Late Secretary to the Royal Society of London.

This is a story of a journey to Palestine. It is of special interest on account of a good deal of the journey being made away from the beaten track, down the valley of the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee. It contains much fresh observation and a great deal of sound argument, as well as many valuable contributions to the Topography of Palestine.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE British Weekly is understood to be a firm and intelligent supporter of liberty and progress, and editorial and other articles from time to time bear witness to this. But its advertising columns, open to purveyors of drugs and many strange kinds of merchandise, are forbidden ground for Unitarian publications. Last week, as on previous occasions, the proprietors of the British Weekly refused to insert an Essex Hall advertisement of books dealing with the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, the Leadership of Jesus, and Salvation by Character. Perhaps the editor will enlighten us on the novel and religious principles which are supposed to be promoted by this refusal to insert advertisements of books with the "Unitarian" label.

THE Rev. J. Page Hopps, it will be seen from the advertisement in another column, is to preach to-morrow (Sunday) evening in Little Portland-street Chapel on the Rev. J. R. Campbell's recent striking sermon, from which we quoted last week, with special reference to his teaching concerning the divinity of man. Readers of The Coming Day are requested to notice that after the present month it will be published by Mr. Fifield, 44, Fleet-street, E.C.

By the time these lines appear in print, the Lords will have read the Education

Bill—their Education Bill, not Mr. Birrell's—a third time. There is little hope, apparently of a satisfactory conclusion to the long and wearisome discussion that has taken place. Rumours of concessions from one side or the other are rife; but, unless the parties agree with their adversaries quickly, the Bill cannot be saved. One concession suggested as feasible is that assistant teachers in schools where special denominational instruction is given should be subject to religious tests, the head teachers being free. We strongly object to a course which would involve special pressure of the kind upon young and immature minds; it cannot be allowed on any consideration.

THE Peace Society renews its invitation to the churches to regard Sunday, December 23, as a day specially to be observed as a Peace Sunday, and issues a statistical statement of the cost of the Armed Peace of Europe. The European armies on a peace footing number at present four and a quarter million men; the number in the different navies is 719,729. These armaments are kept up at a cost of £266,202,845. Great Britain's share of this wasteful expenditure amounts to no less than £63,202,000, while Russia is second in unenviable notoriety with an expenditure of £51,130,224. Such figures speak for themselves, and they indicate in a terrible fashion how far removed we are from the condition of Peace on Earth.

YET signs of hope are not wanting, and the report which has just been issued of the last meeting of the International Association for Labour Legislation is of good augury. The association is only five years old, but at the conference held in Geneva last September delegates were present from eleven European States, and from the United States of America. There were private persons. A very satisfactory indication of the importance of the conference is afforded by the presence of representatives of ten of these European Governments. The Government of this country was not represented, but it is hoped that it will be in 1908. The subjects dealt with included the employment of children, the night work of young persons, home work, workmen's insurance, industrial poisons. In the last section the use of phosphorus in matchmaking came up, and it is humiliating to have to record that this country blocks the way to reform. The details of the deliberations of the conference are necessarily of rather a technical character, but the work is not on that account the less valuable. Further information can be obtained from the Hon. Secretary of the British Section, Miss Sanger, Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C.

It will be enough, therefore, to draw attention to the larger significance of the association's work. It is international, nor is it merely an international society of individuals. Many Governments send delegates to its deliberations, and some of them subsidise the monthly bulletin in which the association publishes the text of all labour laws and digests of the reports on labour questions issued in various countries. We have here, in short, the beginning of an international court. So far as this method of international agreement extends it will do away with one of the stock arguments against every improvement of labour conditions. The fear of foreign competition is always conjured up. We are told we cannot do this or that because some other country does not do it. This movement is one for improving labour conditions everywhere, by doing away, first of all, with the most backward conditions. Progress on these lines may be slow, but the aim is a great one, namely, to contribute to that union of the peoples in industry and peace which will make our bloated armaments obviously unnecessary. The most considerable achievement of the movement is seen in the treaty, the first of its kind, between France and Italy in 1904. Italy undertook to improve its inspection of factories (where not a few French subjects are employed). France in return granted greater protection to Italian children in France. The idea of the treaty was as expressed in the preamble that the "most favoured nation" clause should be extended from merchandise to human beings. A small beginning, but out of such great issues come. When some future historian traces the origin of the European Ministry of Labour he will perforce refer to such treaties as these, and the work done by the spiritual sappers and miners of the International Association for Labour Legislation.

THE first sermon of a series, noting "Thirty Years' Changes in Religious Thought," on "The Idea of God," is published by the Rev. C. Hargrove in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. Mr. Hargrove has now been preaching for thirty years in Mill Hill Chapel, and the changes of that period, he thinks, have been as great as in the thirty generations which preceded it. The change in the Idea of God, which he describes, is towards a truer apprehension of the meaning of Spirit and the Divine Presence in the world.

CAMBRIDGE, U.S.A.

CAMBRIDGE, although in itself a town, serves as a distinguished suburb of Boston. The broad Charles River, which marks the line of division, is less a barrier of separation than a bond of union, for the trolley cars which cross the bridges are usually crowded in both directions. But a mile or more of shops must be passed before old Cambridge is reached. Old, indeed, for can it not claim that it was founded in 1631? And envied truly are they to be who live near the old Common, with its monuments and its Washington elm, or along its historic streets of fine old trees whose gorgeous autumn foliage glows with all the rainbow colours. Cambridge contains, surely, the very aristocracy of New England society. Its famous houses are many, both in literature and history, and its homes are almost English in their comfort and simplicity, but American most assuredly in their frank and cordial hospitality.

Yet Cambridge means primarily Harvard University. In 1636 the Colony granted £100 wherewith to found a school; in 1638 John Harvard died and left his library, with £800, to the newly founded College. From these beginnings have risen, through the years, the great group of buildings, with their hosts of professors, and their six thousand students, which now constitute jointly the famed Harvard University.

The Harvard buildings are disappointing to an Englishman. To expect replicas of Oxford Colleges would be insular and unfair, and Gothic, moreover, is not the only good architecture; but there is little of the academic, or the artistic, about these red-brick Harvard Halls. To call them glorified factories is, of course, too harsh, but it exaggerates their appearance. They are substantial, useful, commodious premises; but without suggestive beauty or grace in their lines.

There are, however, exceptions. Of these the most notable is Memorial Hall, with its proud tower and its imposing exterior. The interior consists of a memorial transept lined with marble tablets to graduates and students who have died in their country's service; a large dining-hall filled at every meal with seven hundred hungry "boys"; and the Sanders Theatre, which has thirteen hundred seats, and is used, not only for university exercises, but also for public concerts and lectures. Over the stage is a fine Latin inscription too long for quotation, but beginning: "Here in the wilderness did English exiles . . . believing that wisdom should first of all be cultivated, by public enactment found a school, and dedicate it to Christ and the Church." At the west end outside is a statue of an imagined John Harvard. Gore Hall, containing the University Library, is Gothic, and of granite, and is said to have been copied from King's College Chapel, Cambridge, England. Austin Hall, the Law School, is of sandstone, and has noble entrance arches and pillars. The Fogg Museum of Art is a freak.

The Harvard curriculum allows a very wide choice, and an early chance to specialise. Broad in its range and conception, it includes, for instance, courses on Public Speaking. Its Divinity School, like Manchester College, is an undenominational, post-graduate school of theology, an open faculty, but it is also a recognised department of the University. Housed within a painfully plain building, but one providing residence and common room, it is the home of much earnest religious thought and happy comradeship. To visit the men in their rooms freely and talk with them frankly about the ministry, its difficulty and its joy, is a helpful experience and a delightful remembrance. Dean Peabody and the rest of the faculty are doing a good work on behalf of Liberal Theology. It was they who organised in 1899 the Summer School of Theology, which has since held eight annual sessions. Each whole session is set apart to a separate subject, that for July next being "Social Ethics."

Religious and social matters receive at Harvard the prominent emphasis which they deserve. Amongst the official publications placed in the hands of the students are two which merit special notice. One, numbering twenty-six pages, is entitled "Opportunities provided for Religious Worship, Instruction, and Fellowship." It gives fullest particulars of the preachers and services at the University Chapel, the religious meetings at the Phillips Brooks House, the details of five religious and philanthropic societies, together with four auxiliary associations, lists of public lectures on religious subjects, and courses of religious study. The other and smaller publication, headed "Harvard University Social Service," points out how to undertake philanthropic work, and how to take personal part in the associated charities of Boston and Cambridge. It also invites the students to conferences on social subjects, and places at their use quite freely a unique Social Service Library. The good that may hence, and must, result, alike to the workers and the work, is very patent, for these papers are not issued merely to special candidates for divinity, but to every student in the University.

Another splendid feature warms the heart of the visitor. The University Chapel is a glorious preamble to the Church Universal! Known as "Appleton," from the chief donor of the building, it is a standing witness and a conclusive proof of the possibility of undenominational worship in a true Church catholic. Attendance is quite voluntary, a privileged opportunity, but students of all denominations listen to preachers of all persuasions, and join heartily in the singing of hymns and the repeating of psalms, which know no sectarian distinctions. This practice is not a mere necessity of the case, but a deliberate reliance on an undenominational basis. At 8.45 each day morning chapel is attended largely, and at the evening service each Sunday the chapel is filled completely. The pure joy of worshipping with others under such ideal conditions, without labels, heresies, or schisms, can only be realised and not described.

Across the street through the Harvard Gate stands the First Parish Church. It is a wooden edifice built by the College in exchange for its old site and adjoining land, now included in the College yard. From 1834 to 1872 the University held its Commencement exercises in this church. The interior is bare, with no line, or tone of association or suggestion, no beauty or grace on either walls or windows. No clinging and climbing ivy as in our Presbyterian chapels, relieves the grimness of the outside walls. The singing is subdued, the psalms are said, and no joyous congregational responses lift up the worship into gladsome praises. This is Puritanism, indeed, unadorned and unashamed! But if the feeling does hence arise that this is chiefly a preaching place, the preacher is there in Dr. Crothers, and a large congregation assembles to hear him each Sunday morning. Blessed is the man to whom is given the inspiration of that congregation. But is Puritanism such a stiff tradition that it cannot yet overcome its old distrust and suspicion of beauty of form as a help to religion? Might it not, in this gentler present, develop and produce, out of its own stern and noble past, a more beautiful art and a more joyful worship?

F. K. F.

BISHOP GORE's brave and timely address to the Wesleyan students at Handsworth, on "Christian Ethics in Relation to Modern Labour Problems," is one more illustration of the compatibility in the modern English character of an unprogressive theology with a living social conscience, and a rational judgment in practical matters. In the new "English Hymnal" we find within the same covers extraordinary doggerel and manly verses like Kipling's "Recessional," and the hymn in which G. K. Chesterton prays God to deliver us from all the easy speeches that comfort cruel men. We need to pray that with us the inconsistency may not take the reverse form of a modern theology along with a slow or unprogressive policy in regard to social and political questions.

WE referred last week to the good services to education long rendered by Mrs. Fielden, of Todmorden, and to the honour recently shown towards her by the Victoria University. In our own community Mrs. Fielden has always been interested in good work; and a little book of "School Prayers," which she published a few months ago, illustrates the broad religious spirit which she seeks to diffuse. Besides the prayers there are alternate readings between teacher and scholars, and suitable hymns for morning and evening. We understand that copies may be had for the asking, and we heartily commend this useful little publication to all interested, especially day-school teachers.

"THE Christian Endeavour Handbook" shows how strong a hold this movement has on Primitive Methodism. There are in the denomination 3,273 societies, with 61,219 active, 14,796 associate, and 38,727 junior members.

LET each man do his own proper work in his own way, but let all have a glad consciousness that they are members one of another.—S. M. Crothers.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE seventeenth century was much more zealous than our own day in its pursuit of the practical parts of divinity. If the science of criticism was then in its infancy the art of spiritual healing had reached its maturity. The great books in the English tongue on the pastoral office are not of our time. The Ductor Dubitantium of Jeremy Taylor, and Baxter's Reformed Pastor survive to remind us of the nice discrimination which was brought to bear upon cases of conscience. The infirmities of the soul received equal attention with those of the body, and a certain skill in spiritual psychology, combined with an exemplary firmness of self-discipline, was a first requisite for the pastoral office. Fashion has changed in these matters. There is something too long, formal, and technical in these treatises on the whole duty of the pastor for the modern mind. We are inclined to disparage system in these delicate personal relationships, and to leave sympathy to do its perfect work without cutting the channels in which it should flow. But it is possible that we have allowed this policy of trusting to our instincts to carry us too far. Questions of conscience are more critical for human life than the more strictly intellectual aspects of belief, and there may be something defective in a clerical training which omits to cultivate as its chief concern these practical parts of divinity.

There is ample reward in store for those who will spend some leisurely hours over the two massive treatises which I have mentioned. They will not dig in vain for nuggets of fine gold. But to those of my readers who are quite obdurate in their dislike of folios let me recommend another book, which can be read at a sitting, of which the beautiful Pickering reprint of 1848 lies before me as I write. I refer to George Herbert's Country Parson, or to give it its full title, A Priest to the Temple; or, the Country Parson, his Character and Rule of Holy Life. It is a small treatise, divided into many short sections according to the subject dealt with—the Parson on Sundays, the Parson Praying, the Parson Preaching, the Parson's Courtesy, the Parson's Charity, the Parson Comforting, the Parson Catechising. It is meant evidently to be a faithful description of the pattern of life which George Herbert had set before himself, and in this respect it has a two-fold interest. It is full of shrewd knowledge of life, and of sympathy with its spiritual needs, and at the same time it sets the standard of the holiness and faithfulness required of the minister of Christ at its highest. But we are drawn to it also by its quaintness. It has the fragrance of a garden of old-fashioned flowers. The following extracts may help to convey some of its flavour and perfume.

"The Country Parson, when he is to read divine services, composeth himself to all possible reverence; lifting up his heart and hands and eyes, and using all other gestures which may express a hearty and unfeigned devotion. This he doth, First, as being truly touched and amazed with the Majesty of God, before Whom he then presents himself; yet not as himself alone, but as presenting with himself the whole congregation; whose sins he then bears, and brings with his own to the heavenly Altar to be bathed, and washed in the sacred Laver of Christ's blood. Secondly, as this is the true reason of his inward fear, so he is content to express this outwardly to the utmost of his power; that being first affected himself he may affect also his people, knowing that no sermon moves them so much to reverence, which they forget again, when they come to pray, as a devout behaviour in the very act of praying."

"The Country Parson preacheth constantly. The Pulpit is his joy and his throne. . . . The character of his Sermons is Holiness; he is not witty, or learned, or eloquent, but holy." The author goes on to explain how this special character is to be gained: "First by choosing Texts of Devotion not Controversy, moving and ravishing Texts, whereof the Scriptures are full. Secondly, by dipping and seasoning all our words and sentences in our hearts before they come into our mouths, truly affecting and cordially expressing all that we say; so that the auditors may plainly perceive that every word is heart-deep. Thirdly, by turning often, and making many Apostrophes to God, as O Lord, bless my people and teach them this point; or, O my Master, on whose errand I come, let me hold my peace, and do Thou speak Thyself: for thou art Love, and when Thou teachest, all are scholars."

His deep reverence for Scripture is manifest everywhere, and with it his insight into its practical value and its emotional appeal. The following words with the strangely vivid image at the close recall the quaintness and the passionate intensity of his verse: "What an admirable Epistle is the second to the Corinthians! how full of affections! he joys, and he is sorry, he grieves, and he glories, never was there such care of a flock expressed, save in the great Shepherd of the fold, who first shed tears over Jerusalem and afterwards blood."

We turn with some curiosity to the pages which describe the Parson's Library, but they are among the strangest ever written on the subject, for they do not contain a single reference to books or their authors. Neither is there about them any of the garniture of classical quotation which lends its blazonry to the stately religious writing of the period. The man of God is to be furnished with the learning of experience. "The Country Parson's Library is a holy Life"—there is the whole matter. "The temptations with which a good man is beset, and the ways which he used to overcome them, being told to another whether in private conference, or in the Church, are a sermon. . . . The Parson having studied and mastered all his lusts and affections within, and the whole Army of Temptations without, hath ever so many sermons ready penned as he hath victories." What excellent sense there is in these sentences as well as religious discernment. They do not cure our taste for the pleasant companionship of books and the wisdom of the printed page, but we cannot say that the gentle rebuke is undeserved, which they administer to the secondhand bookishness of many sermons.

One other passage must be allowed, for none is more characteristic of Herbert's peculiar gift and influence. It is from the chapter called The Parson's Church. "The Country Parson hath a special care of his Church, that all things there be decent and befitting his Name, by which it is called. Therefore, First, he takes order, that all things be in good repair as walls plastered, windows glazed, floor paved, seats whole, firm, and uniform, especially that the Pulpit and Desk and Communion Table, and Font be as they ought, for those great duties that are performed in them: Secondly, that the Church be swept, and kept clean without dust, or cobwebs, and at great Festivals strewed and stuck with boughs, and perfumed with incense: Thirdly, that there be fit and proper Texts of Scripture everywhere painted, and that all the painting be grave and reverend, not with light colours or foolish antics. . . . And all this he doth, not as out of necessity, or as putting a holiness in the things, but as desiring to keep the middle way between superstition and slovenliness, and as following the Apostle's two great and admirable Rules in things of this nature: the first whereof is, Let all things be done decently and in order: the second, Let all things be done to edification." There is no taint of ritualism in these words. George Herbert knew that the symbolism of worship loses its value when it becomes opaque and men cease to see the divine idea gleaming through the material form: But Puritanism never had any attraction for him. Loyal to the belief that a certain stateliness and reverence befit the public offices of religion, and that delicacy of feeling and beauty of form agree together, he was a devoted son of the Church of England, where he found a ritual of devotion both "sweet and bright."

"A fine aspect in fit array Neither too mean nor yet too gay."

It has been said of him that he "revealed with no inefficient or temporary effect to the uncultured and unlearned the true refinement of worship."

If, however, this little book deepens in this way our sense of the value of the ordered beauty of the sanctuary, that is only one element in the rich and satisfying impression which it makes upon the mind. It glorifies the ministerial office, and surrounds the humble lot of the country parson with an indescribable dignity. But it does so not by any foolish or wayward heightening of professional claims, but by its gentle yet passionate concern for the spiritual guidance of men, and the severity of the discipline which it imposes upon the parson himself.

THE HISTORIC CHRIST.*

THE title which Mr. Lacey has given to these reprinted lectures belonged to the Master of Balliol—pater gentilitatis nostræ, as the writer gracefully calls him—but was resigned on Mr. Lacey's request. Mr. Lacey calls it an "almost indispensable" title. It is, in fact, extremely misleading. The period during which a man appears in history is, to the ordinary understanding, the period between his birth and his death. But about the Jesus who had been born and was not yet dead, about the historic Jesus of Nazareth, his sayings, doings, thoughts, aims, achievements, and failures, Mr. Lacey has almost nothing to say. When he refers to the human life of Jesus, or to any of his words, the reference is always incidental to some Christological question; the writer's thought is dated after the Resurrection, and his glances at the ministry in Galilee are retrospective, and not motivated by any direct interest. For instance, we find in the fourth lecture these striking words about the portrait of Jesus in Mark, "It is the portraiture, modified in the later Gospels, gentle and yet austere, a master of stern teaching, less than half understood by his disciples, making great demands upon their confidence, and moving forward with fixed purpose to an end which they cannot grasp. It is a figure in every way extraordinary; a figure that rivets the attention of the world, the figure of one who passes the measure of humanity and is yet unmistakably, emphatically, man." The next words are, "I ask why such a portraiture was drawn." Mr. Lacey assumes that the writer was a Pauline believer, that Paulinism was orthodox, universal, and degenerating into Docetism, and that Mark "made his selection of incidents" . . . "after so many years of developed teaching," when "it is amazing to reflect that such a portraiture was possible," with the direct purpose of counteracting the erroneous view of the Incarnation as a pure theophany. This is a new and stimulative handling of the old Tübingen methods.

Another, perhaps even more significant illustration of Mr. Lacey's attitude to the real Jesus is given in his treatment of the passage, "Upon this rock will I build my church." The doubt which critical considerations throw upon the exceptional word "church," the possibility of its substitution for "kingdom," at a time when the two terms had identity of meaning, are fully conceded; but they are obviated by the suggestion that Jesus "may have spoken of the Church as distinct from the Kingdom, only in . . . the more intimate conversations between the Master and his disciples" of which very little is recorded. "I labour this point for two reasons. First, because the presentment of the historic personality of Jesus Christ is affected. It may be inaccurate in history, as it certainly is inadequate in theology, to call him the Founder of the Church; but it is important to show him in his relation to the Church." The second reason is that a church intentionally founded by Jesus "is a better historic witness than one which has come casually into being."

We see in these and similar passages in what sense Mr. Lacey uses the word "historic." It is the sense of the Catholic Church. "The Church has shown comparatively small interest in the details of the Lord's human life. It has carefully guarded the truth of his humanity; but no remote allusion to his Galilean activity has found its way into the Creeds." Mr. Lacey accepts the standpoint of the Church and the Creeds, and by "the historic Christ" he means a being organically connected with historic Christianity.

It is clear, then, that Mr. Lacey's attitude is, on the whole, uncritical. His prepossessions are strong, and, it will seem to most students of his subject, of a nature to disable him for scientific investigation. He accepts enormous propositions on evidence which, without such prepossessions to interpret it, is highly uncertain, ludicrously inadequate, or even inapplicable. "Certain facts for which there is little historical evidence, or none at all that is in itself convincing, are held for true, because of their implication with the objects of faith. You believe that some things happened as recorded, because you conceive it impossible that the Christian society in which the record was preserved can have gone so far astray as to accept a false tradition." With regard to the Virgin-birth, the Descent into Hell, the Ascension, "you receive these facts as facts because of their intimate connection with what you accept as the immediate object of faith."

Could any position be more orthodox, or less critical? The unwitting reader will be surprised to learn that Mr. Lacey's orthodoxy has been the object of a vigorous attack in the Oxford University pulpit, and that the charges urged against him were by no means without plausibility; for in all the processes of collecting and sifting evidence, and estimating its logical resultant, Mr. Lacey displays a remarkable degree of candour and detachment. The solution of this paradox lies in Mr. Lacey's conception of faith, and of the relation between faith and logic. His view adheres "in a measure" to that of M. Loisy. "There is," he writes, "a method of reasoning which generates an intense conviction of spiritual truths. This intense conviction is Faith, which is therefore not a special faculty, but a special condition of mind. Faith and science are properly put in contradistinction; they are two distinct conditions of mind attained by two distinct methods." When we inquire by what method the convictions of faith are reached, we are told that it is "superlatively subtle" and "defies analysis." In a particular application: "What then is faith in the Resurrection of Jesus Christ? It is an intense conviction of the spiritual truths which the fact of the resurrection signifies. If you ask me how we know that these truths are true, I can only answer that the conviction of their truth is reached by the method of faith. . . . You cannot demonstrate" the truths of the higher mathematics "to me if I am ignorant of elementary mathematics. Neither can I demonstrate spiritual truths to you if you have not the elements of faith." This is to all actual effect, merely an interesting, variant of the common plea that faith is a kind of intuition, transcending all the processes of reason.

Mr. Lacey is therefore free to examine, with perfect detachment and no anxiety, the historical basis of Christian dogma in the light of evidence. To him "the Synoptic tradition is the tradition of St. Mark." The Johannine writings are "Christian documents of the end of the first century." Throughout his dealings with books and events the writer preserves a tone of amenity and reserve; other considerations, he seems to hold in mind, might be argued from another point of view, and contrary conclusions arrived at. Why not? It is all nothing but a refined sort of game. He takes the same kind of interest in it as a mathematician who, having proved a formula by one method, wishes to see whether it can be attained by another. It is the method, not the result, which is on trial.

It is, however, humanly impossible for one who is absolutely certain of particular conclusions to examine without bias, and estimate impartially, evidence which purports to establish them. Dicta such as this betray the inability of a man with blue spectacles to distinguish between red and purple. "It would be remarkable indeed if a tradition like that of Christianity, being anything more or less than the truth, could establish itself in the face of bitterly hostile criticism. . . . Documentary evidence could not be sounder than such a tradition." The attribution of a modern critical standpoint to the Jews of the Dispersion, among whom Christianity first spread, and to the legionaries whose acceptance of it led to Constantine's conversion, is itself in the highest degree uncritical. It cannot surprise us that Mr. Lacey finds "good historical evidence" for the empty tomb, and for the subsequent appearances of the Lord "alive in the body." And this body was "the body which he took of Mary," though it had entered upon "a new and strange" state of corporal existence. This is not the voice of scientific inquiry, but the complacency of a conviction pre-determined.

Mr. Lacey's treatment of the Ascension is especially ingenious. He recognises that in the light of the Copernican astronomy the concept "going up into Heaven" is void of meaning, but he holds that even in the Ptolemaic cosmography it was fraught with almost insuperable difficulties, difficulties which for us "disappear precisely because we have not a clear-cut mental image into which the observed facts have to be fitted. . . . Our faith is less robust than that of the old saints; but it has fewer difficulties to overcome." Nevertheless he suggests that "the uplifting from the earth, the reception into the cloud, were for the presentment of the fact [that Christ had passed out of earthly conditions] to their eyes," the eyes of the disciples. We have to ask why this miraculous presentment should have been vouchsafed, if it loaded faith in the Resurrection with cosmographical difficulties. To a reader without prepossession the account in the Acts is quite simple. It is conceived in terms of the ordinary unscientific conception that Heaven is up above the earth—"Heaven" and "sky" are synonyms—and there is no cosmographical reflection present in the writer's mind. At the end of his last earthly appearance, Jesus goes up, from a point near Bethany, through cloud into Heaven. When he is next seen, by Stephen, he is in Heaven, at the right hand of God. When Paul sees him, it is in the midst of a light from Heaven. Heaven was evidently conceived as a place above the earth, and the Ascension as a journey from the one place to the other.

Mr. Lacey's book is admirably written, with clearness and distinction of style, and the strangeness of its point of view gives it a special kind of provocative interest for scientific students.

PHILOSOPHY is properly a home-sickness—a longing to be everywhere at home.—Novalis:

MANY years ago the writer of this notice heard an enthusiastic Wesleyan preacher, just out of college, describe a sermon which he once heard by his tutor; who went through the whole contents of Methodist Theology "beginning with the existence of God and ending with the eternity of hell's torments." The formidable looking volume just given to the world by Dr. Agar Beet has about the same compass as that tremendous sermon, for the first section is headed "Nature and God," and the closing section bears the title "The last things." It will be some comfort to the student, as it is to the reviewer of the volume, to find that when he has courage to open it he has a somewhat smaller burden to bear than he expected. For, ponderous as the volume looks, it contains less than 600 pages. Yet it will either be a very patient, or a very light hearted, student who does not pronounce it tiring before the end is reached. Many of the greatest problems which demand his attention as student, Christian, or man are here placed before him. And the trouble is not that the problems are so difficult and the mystery so great, but rather that they seem to be settled so easily, to be marked off one by one as finished before ever there has been opportunity of truly estimating the magnitude of the question, to say nothing of the adequacy of the solution. A teasing semblance of philosophy at the opening of a section arouses a faint hope in the reader's mind that we are coming now to first principles. But before he has well stepped over the threshold of a new thought he is thrown back upon Scripture texts, and is confounded with the re-appearance of Rom., Jno., 1 Cor., Zeph., and others who settled all things for him, and determined what he should think ages before he was born. If only some few things were left doubtful. If he were allowed to try his own powers in reconciling not all the statements ever written by Darwin and "Moses," but the existence in the same world, the proximity in the same library, the assimilation by the same mental faculties of the scientific romance of the first chapters of "Genesis," and the romantic science of Darwin's "Origin of Species," he might get at length to have some notion of the use which Providence intended him to make of both these sources of edification. But he is hemmed in and hampered by a multitude of texts, and if he broke away from one a half-dozen others would catch him. It is to no purpose that he struggles. The texts have got hold of him, and he has to hear what they say. If, then, he has any doubt the writer of this book will assist him and put matters right.

"Had he (Adam) obeyed the voice Divine, we may infer that obedience would have raised him above the doom of death, to which animals are subject. But he yielded to that in him akin to animals, and fell under the doom under which all animals lie. Consequently, Adam's death was a result of his own sin; for had he not sinned he would not have died. And the wide prevalence of heredity in human life makes it easy to believe that his mortality was inherited by his descendants. If so, the universality of death to-day is, as Paul teaches, a result of Adam's sin."

It may seem curious to sample a big volume by a quotation of few lines. But the style is just the same elsewhere. A dogmatism which seems often harsh and crude pervades the book. How the gracious influence of the Communion Service must be disturbed for one who has been told more than once by his theological tutor "Christ made the supper by expressly commanding it, an indispensable condition of salvation." How the stubborn spirit of a sinful son of Adam rises in resistance to this arbitrary decree. Invited to the supper he might gladly respond; warned that he is only free to partake of it if he repents of his sin and is in love and charity with all men he might yet dare to go forward hoping with poor Joan of Arc that if he is not in a state of grace Heaven may put him in such a state. But prove to him that the invitation is a command, and indispensable for salvation, he will very likely decide to risk his salvation rather than attend. He will be hardened in this decision by remembering that not individuals only but organised groups of Christian men have taken the same risk. We have called no attention in this notice to those doctrines of Dr. Beet, which have caused some perturbation among the Wesleyans. They will be found in the last section of the book, but they need not cause any prolongation of this notice, as the matter has previously been referred to in the INQUIRER. That this volume is in its way a careful and complete handbook cannot be denied. But we cannot conceal the impression that it is a book which the younger generation of evangelical students will before long find to be out of date.

SHORT NOTICES

Young Days. An Illustrated Magazine for Children and Young People. Edited by J. J. Wright, F.R.S.L. Vol. xxxi. Of course, our children know what this is, and welcome the bound volume at Christmas. It is good to take from month to month and do the Guild work. Those who have not done it might well take the bound volume and do it now, with its pictures of Palestine and study of the life of Jesus. The monthly contributions by the Rev. H. M. Livens on "Listening to the Nature Folks" are alone worth more than the price of the book. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. 6d. net.)

The Scholar-Gipsy and Thyrsis, by Matthew Arnold, with illustrations by Edmund H. New, is a book which lovers of those two poems who appreciate the artist's work, should be very glad to have. Each right-hand page has a single verse, and twelve of the thirteen illustrations are printed on left-hand pages, the rest being blank. The fine line drawing of Mr. New's work we find always fascinating. The frontispiece shows a distant view of Oxford, from a shaded hill-side:

"Screen'd is this nook, o'er the high,
half-reap'd field,

And the eye travels down to Oxford's towers."

Another of the smaller pictures is: "In autumn, on the skirts of Bagley's Wood." Facing the opening verse of "Thyrsis" is North Hincsey Churchyard. One of the most charming bits is South Hincsey, from the Causeway. Less successful is the attempt to realise: "Bare on its lonely ridge, the Tree! the Tree!" With these rural scenes, by way of contrast, should be compared Mr. New's drawings of Oxford Colleges in Messrs. Dent's series of College Monographs, of which we have seen, with great pleasure, that of New College. We are interested also to hear that Messrs. Methuen will shortly publish a Wordsworth selection, for which Mr. Stopford Brooke has chosen the poems and written an introduction; and Mr. New has made the drawings. But we turn back to Arnold's two poems, and note another picture: "Above Godstow Bridge." The book is just made for a pleasant Christmas gift. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Pilgrim of the Infinite, by William Davies. New Edition. The general spirit of this book is a call to the soul to answer its inward light by immediate and constant obedience. This will reveal new wonders in the common ways—"every earthly experience will become a lesson for eternity." The soul's obedience to the Divine Illuminator will open up new ways of social service, and make the efforts towards the brotherhood more vivid and convincing. It will give suffering its place in the scheme of things, even perhaps to the height of the author's optimism, in which he speaks of suffering as "undoubtedly the ideal of human life"—which is not far from the glory of Calvary in some devout writers. Prayer is the soul's condition, not always its utterance. "True prayer is a climbing into the higher will of God, not the expression of a desire for a selfish object." As the soul in its pilgrimage becomes more sensitive to unseen influences, immortality becomes a more conscious reality, so that it is possible to say: "The dead are not lost to us even here. The presence of those we love is still about us; it may be in a more intimate manner than when they were with us in person." A book which advocates so keenly this personal life and development of the spiritual in us, which through this spiritual activity sees the deliverance of Christianity from the bondage of letter and form, is a welcome addition to the many forces telling in the same direction to-day, and should prove a useful thing to place in the hands of those just emerging into spiritual liberty, or feeling after it: (S. The Problem of the Pentateuch, an examination of the results of the Higher Criticism, by Randolph H. McKim, D.D., LL.D., Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D.C. THE LATE WYBERT REEVE. AN APPRECIATION.

ON November 14, at Newport, Isle of Wight, whither he had recently removed from Fulham, a notable man, at the eventide of life, passed away from us, Mr. Wybert Reeve, actor, manager, lecturer, and scholar. He was a man of fine culture and nice literary gifts, able to clothe his thoughts in fitting language, both as a conversationalist and a writer, and many people, in both hemispheres, have a vivid recollection of his picturesque and luminous language, both as a speaker and writer. His love for the stage, and his strong desire to be a living interpreter of the highest thoughts of our greatest dramatists, gave the bent to his life. He knew, with greatest intimacy and appreciation, all the works of Shakespeare, and could illuminate his ordinary conversation with the most apt quotations from that great master of thought and life. But it was more in the common humanities than in the deepest tragedies that he found his greatest joy. His lighter parts on the stage, like those of Charles Mathews, saw him at his happiest, though he never, perhaps, rose to a greater height on the stage than when he interpreted, to the intense satisfaction of his friend, Wilkie Collins, and the public generally, the character of Count Fosco in the "Woman in White." In this character he travelled not only in the United Kingdom but in America and Australia, and everywhere with the greatest acceptance.

I had the privilege of knowing Wybert Reeve throughout nearly the whole of his career. While he was in England, both in his earlier and later days, I saw a great deal of him and knew much about his personal life and aims, and during his long absence in the Antipodes our correspondence was almost unbroken as the years sped by. This long and close intimacy enables me to say a few things which may not be without value. In all his career Mr. Reeve was guided by a high standard of ethics, and was always devoutly religious. Though he was, I believe, the son of a clergyman of the Established Church, he soon, by careful thought and study, became an earnest and convinced Unitarian of the most Catholic type, and never hesitated in any society or in any land to let his principles be fully known. Sometimes he broke through the traditions of the stage, and spoke from our Unitarian pulpits and platforms with great unction and persuasiveness. At an early period he associated himself with me, when he was lessee of the South Shields theatre, in the establishment of our church in that borough, and one of his latest, if not his last, appearances in any of our pulpits was at Shrewsbury a year ago, when he preached one of the anniversary sermons, with great acceptance. Between these two periods he served wherever he could the church he loved so well, and never failed to identify himself with any of our congregations that were within his reach. Mr. Reeve kept the high standard of moral and religious life throughout his career, and brought on to the stage, and in his dealings with his many theatrical companies, every noble and uplifting principle which ought to animate their lives. He helped and saved many a struggling actor and actress and all who came in contact with him found him to be a man of moral purity and of the cleanest honour. I think that many who have doubts about the stage and its influence will feel that when it is guided by a man of such high religious life as that which animated Mr. Reeve, it can only be an instrument of good for the exaltation of the people. Farewell, old friend and comrade, until we meet again!

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary is of unusual interest. Miss Edith Sellars, who writes on "Poor Relief in Vienna," has a long note in which she justifies her strictures on the neglect of the aged poor in Berlin (the one flaw which she had noted in a most admirable system) in reply to Dr. Münsterberg's article of last month. Professor James Seth has an admirable article on the Norwegian System of Liquor Control, pointing out how it must be distinguished from the neighbouring Swedish Gotenburg system, since it avoids the danger of eagerness for municipal profit from the trade. Mr. Stephen Coleridge describes the constitution of the Royal Commission on Experiments on Live Animals, and its decision to exclude the press and to refuse to admit Counsel representing opposing interests to cross-examine witnesses. This, in the view of the Anti-Vivisection Societies, seriously cripples the effectiveness of the inquiry, and destroys the impartiality of the Commission, before which the Societies have therefore refused to give evidence. Sir Oliver Lodge contributes an address on "Work and Life," given in September to a Workers' Education Conference in Birmingham University. It contains much food for reflection. "We have to remember," Sir Oliver concludes, "that life is more than livelihood, and that man does not live by bread alone. We must spread our net far and wide, and study in no narrow and utilitarian spirit, if we are to get the best from education. And the true wealth of an individual does not, any more than the true wealth of a country, consist in the abundance of things which he possesses, but in his own indomitable soul. The true wealth of a nation is, finally and ultimately, the number of healthy, happy human beings which compose her." The address should be read, and in this connection note also the article in the Nineteenth Century and After on "Physical Training in Stockholm and Copenhagen," by Mrs. Scharlieb, and also Mrs. Bertram Russell's account of the "Ghent School for Mothers." A contribution to the population question is Mr. J. W. Barclay's article on "The Race Suicide Scare," and Mr. Keir Hardie writes on the Labour Movement. Miss G. L. Bell gives a most interesting account of the College at Aligarh in her article on "Islam in India," and Miss C. A. Barnicoat, on "The Reading of the Colonial Girl," furnishes some interesting results of inquiries both among British and Colonial girls. Edna Lyall, it appears, is their prime favourite among novelists. The British give the next three places on the poll to Seton Merriman, Stevenson, and Stanley Weyman; the Colonials to Miss Alcott, Mrs. Henry Wood, and R. N. Carey. Returning to the Contemporary, we note with special satisfaction Mrs. Fawcett's article on "The Prisoners of Hope in Holloway Gaol." "Fundamentally," Mrs. Fawcett writes "women are intensely law-abiding; it is a part of their physical constitution to be so, and bitter, indeed, is their sense of wrong before they can be driven to any extra-constitutional courses." Mrs. Fawcett, though she says, if she had known what those women intended to do, she should have seriously dissuaded them from such a course, admits that she would have been mistaken, for they have done great service in compelling attention to their cause. Yet she still holds with the majority that constitutional means are by no means yet exhausted. Franchise for women on the same terms as men, is what they demand. That would mean, she says, 1,500,000 women to 7,000,000 men electors now; whereas universal suffrage would mean a majority of women. The former demand is now practical politics. Those who have grown impatient over this question should especially read the article. In connection with the education controversy note also Dr. Forsyth's article on "Church, State, Dogma, and Education"; with its plea for a secular system on high religious grounds.

The Argument à Priori for the Being and the Attributes of the Lord God. By W. Honyman Gillespie.—This book is admirably printed, and when a work represents a considerable portion of the life of the author, and a considerable amount of the funds of his widow we have two grounds for declining to put it too hastily aside. Nevertheless, the opinion must be honestly expressed that it attempts the impossible, and must be classed with the perpetual motion. Moreover, the rigid scientific form which is suggested by the careful numbering and classification of propositions and sub-propositions is but an allusion. We meet with alternative statements, with statements approximate, and occasionally with a moral reflection, pert perhaps, but not deduced by any inexorable logic from what has preceded. In the discussion of a corollary from Proposition III. we find the following reflection: "Alas! it is quite possible to utter nonsense on any subject." That is the very mischief. And many of these earnestly written and excellently printed paragraphs suggest how very little a man need go out of the path of clear logical reasoning before finding himself in a country as lacking in sequence and regularity as Alice's Wonderland. SUGGESTIONS ON RE-STATEMENT.
III.—JESUS CHRIST.

It is sometimes said that it is the teaching of Christ rather than himself that is valuable. His contribution to religion is to be thrown into the general stock and there relinquish its individuality. This eighteenth century view leaves out of sight the fact that there is no such thing as religion in general; every religion has a definite historical setting and growth; and just as it is the highest kind of man that loses most by being depersonalised, so it is the most highly differentiated religion that most tenaciously preserves its own special features. Now the most special fact about Christianity is Christ. But over and above these general reasons for emphasising Christ's Person there are others peculiar to Christianity. (1) The deepened meaning given by Christianity to man's communion with God is not merely an idea which Christ could teach and then leave to its fortunes. It is an achievement of a peculiarly personal kind; less to be compared, e.g., with an inventor's invention than with a supreme poet's inspiration. It is not communicable except on one condition—that the person who has the experience is himself in some way communicated. If Christ's words are the whole of his message, then, alas! we have lost most of them; and those which are preserved only get their full interpretation from after history. It is not indeed for its own sake that the personality of Jesus is carefully treasured in the world's historical consciousness, but for the sake of what it embodies. Still, it is His personality that is treasured. The subject of the Gospel was not properly either God, or Jesus, but the conscious personal relation of Jesus to God. The Fatherhood of God meant in the first place that He was Father of Jesus. The history we read when we read gospel history is the history of the sacred colloquy between the soul of God and the soul of Jesus. What do we mean by a "Revelation of God"? If we put aside mere verbalisms, a revelation of Divine fact could be won only through a personal experience much richer than any mere "knowledge" that could be handed on by speech. It must include the incoming of heightened moral power. It must enter as a new organising principle into the experience of the recipient, and the charges it works must be organic, formative; something not only received by his experience, but creative of it. And by the same line of reasoning, the transmission, also, of the Revelation must be organic: It is not merely as if Jesus might say, "I know God, and I tell you that you can know Him." His experience must enter as an organising principle into the experiences of other men: The organic structure of human relationships is the natural medium for such transmission. There is no need to make a mystery of this. The transcendent personality of Christ found channels already dug for its flow in the normal interconnections of man's social life. The Church has always testified to the perpetuation in its midst of Christ's fellowship with God, and our statement is only an attempt to show this fellowship as both unique and normal. (Whereas the perfunctory explanation that "God was incarnate in Jesus, and also in all men" is an attempt to say, in one breath, that Jesus was and was not unique.) The unique is not necessarily the abnormal. Whatever strangeness infects the conception of the transmitted personality of Jesus (a necessary conception for Christianity) is due to the neglect of the facts above noted—that the Revelation was moral, organic—i.e., entered as a creative organising principle into human nature, and was transmitted as such. It was more than what is ordinarily meant by "personal." It was something that used and transcended persons, even Christ's person. It was Christ not after the flesh, but after the spirit. But (2) the above facts only present us with an abstract form of Christ's communion with God. We must pass therefore from theological notions of "Incarnation" to religious ideas of Redemption. There is an unfortunate disposition to regard the former as the important point. Yet the doctrine of the Trinity, when it was alive, found its roots quite as much in the latter as in the former. Now that Trinity has become obsolete, Incarnation has come to the front (as it has always done in ages when men asked for light rather than life) only in response to the modern demand for gnosis, for a constructive account of the world which shall be as telling and ample as that of materialism. Maurice, Hutton, Gore, are spirits born of conflict with the latter. The question was, How in the midst of a world of hard, brute fact to show Jesus as the Revealer of the hidden God? Not, how are men saved? But once the "magical" view of Incarnation is replaced by the moral or organic, as above, the whole interest centres in the details of the revelation, i.e., in Redemption. We make but a sorry picture of Christ's experience when we reduce it to the rhapsodical friendship of a Son with a Father. Self-sacrificing love of man was only another aspect of his love of God. He organised redemption, and his followers were woven into a web of lives which reproduced his living revelation of God's mercy.

By way of summary, we may arrange in an ascending scale of adequacy the possible descriptions of Christ's work. (1) Example is not comprehensive enough. It is an ethical rather than a religious word. (2) Revealer is better, but says nothing of the fabric of lives in which the revelation is perpetuated. (3) Thus he is a Revelation. This is the step on which the individual religious life has its demands met. (4) Next comes the need of the believer to participate in the work of Christ. The self-identification of the experience of Christians with that of Christ makes all the difference between a religious and a merely ethical Christianity. Our spiritual oneness with him is the most precious illustration of our human solidarity. Therefore, he is our Sacrament (sacrament= both symbol, and thing symbolised). He symbolises our victory; and he is our victory. (5) But his work is most profoundly characterised as sacrifice, burden-bearing; the necessity for which arose through sin. He is therefore Saviour, as head of the hosts of those through whom salvation is being evolved. (6) As creator of astounding moral values in their experience he is thus Lord of their love, and object of their faith. W. WHITAKER.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THIS week and next, and then Christmas will be here! It is always the same every year, a time of great gladness and thanksgiving. In spite of all the sadness in the world, and the terrible things that happen, people cannot help being filled with joy, and believing in goodness. It is a time for doing kindnesses, and finding out again, if we have forgotten, that the secret of true happiness is in unselfishness, in loving and helping, and especially helping those who have the least brightness in their lives and are most in need.

And all this new gladness, and this better understanding of what our life ought to be like, began with the life of one little child, one boy, who grew up in Nazareth long, long ago, whose birthday we keep on Christmas Day. Other teachers have helped, and other good influences have come together, to make the rich power of unselfish love and goodness which we have in Christianity; but it began with Jesus, the greatest teacher of all, the best friend and helper; and therefore we are all glad at Christmas time, and try to make others glad, remembering what he has taught us and what he is to us. We are Christians when we have the same spirit in us which made his life so beautiful. Christmas ought to help us to be more like him, and so to be better Christians than ever.

We think of him and how he helped the people of his own time; what a wise and tender friend he was; how he loved the children and liked to see their happiness. And it is good for us to think of his own home in Nazareth, and what he was as a little child, and then as an elder boy among the other children, and afterwards as a young man taking up work as a carpenter. Here are some verses, which may help you to imagine it:—

"By fancies blinded and beguiled,
Men say the Saviour never smiled;
Ah, perfect youth and perfect boy,
How could he choose but thrill with joy?
Nor yet the cruel cross he bore,
Him God and man loved more and more;
He prospered, and drew balmy breath
In the fresh air of Nazareth."

And younger children, unreprieved,
Made mirth around the youth they loved;
To him none proffered suit in vain,
Unsolaced none confessed his pain;
Ofttimes he cooled the fevered head,
And watched beside the sleepless bed:
Best comforter in life and death
Was Jesus unto Nazareth."

The quiet hills, the skies above,
The faces round were bright with love;
He lost not, in the tranquil place,
One hint of wisdom or of grace;
Not unobserved, nor vague nor dim,
The secret of the world to him,
The prayer he heard which Nature saith
In the still glades by Nazareth."

Think of the boy when he was quite young, gentle and brave, when he was beginning to learn the meaning of what he afterwards taught: Blessed are the peace-makers; blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; blessed are the pure in heart. Think what it means, and how it helps to make the happiness of Christmas-time.

MISSIONARY ZEAL.

THE first annual meetings of the Unitarian Van Mission, which we reported last week, were clearly marked by a very genuine enthusiasm, and it is most refreshing to have the testimony of those who were intimately associated with the work of the Mission throughout the summer, to the prevailingly positive and helpfully religious character of the appeal that was made. Mr. SPEDDING, our apostle of the Van, has indeed from the first declared that this is to be the aim. In THE INQUIRER of July 15, 1905, his first paper on the proposed Mission was published, and we wrote of it then: "Describing the work the missionary of the van is to do, he says that in the religious services to be held the addresses should be affirmative, not controversial, and religious rather than doctrinal; there is to be a brotherhood 'that speaks for God and man in the strength of Jesus.' That is an admirable ideal, and if that is what is really intended and will be carried out, we say, God speed the Unitarian Van! If only our Lancashire brethren have a man fit to send out on such a mission, by all means let them equip the van and put it on the road. He must not be one who is eager to blow a noisy Unitarian trumpet, but a man overflowing with human sympathies and a passion for righteousness, a man of simplicity and strength, who can speak straight to the people's hearts, and he must go out to declare to them pure, unsectarian religion."

Now we are assured that during the past summer the occasion has called many men into the field who have proved themselves capable, in an unexpected way, of speaking strong and helpful words of direct and sympathetic appeal, and that there was an eager response on the part of the people. For such an experience one can only be most thankful, and must hope that such power will grow, and that the men possessed of it may keep a firm hold upon the true ideal and make it effective, not only in the field, but in the churches. For after all the value of the word must be tested by its fruit in the churches.

At the evening meeting in Manchester last week, there was indeed one courageous word of warning uttered. Mrs. CEREDIG JONES asked whether the Mission had not been conducted on too sectarian lines. The addresses she had heard appeared to her disproportionately devoted to controversy. How far such an impression was justified in any particular case we need not stop to inquire; the warning undoubtedly points to a danger that has to be guarded against. It is easy to slip into a merely contentious theological argument, much more difficult to speak the word of life direct from heart to heart; but that is the only thing that makes the Van Mission or any other religious mission really worth while. And we are assured that during this first season of the Van that has been prevailingly the case. Certainly, we are convinced, that in this whole business Mr. SPEDDING is inspired by a very earnest religious motive, and that in his hands the Mission will be sure of wise and steadfast direction.

What is wanted is, not so much that we should blazon forth our ism, and be always talking about its superior enlightenment and liberalism, but that with all our heart we should be speaking out its truth, its passion for righteousness, its genuine humanity, love and brotherhood, and make it felt as, indeed, a power unto life — in touch with the real things of life, moving the hearts of men, and really advancing the Kingdom of God in our midst. We received last week with warm sympathy the letter from the Rev. ALFRED THOMPSON. We are weary of self-conscious talk about ourselves, and jealous comparison of ourselves with others. Let us attend to worthier things. We want to be doing God's work in the world and manifesting the power of His truth. We also are set to preach the Gospel, "as the power of God unto salvation"; and we have to learn to do it with greater simplicity and self-forgetfulness—not to be always explaining how we understand it so much better than other people, but to make its power felt. We by no means share the impatience and seeming contempt of theology expressed by Mr. SHRUBSOLE in his letter this week. It is, we hold, vital to clear thinking, and to a firm grasp of the truth of our life with God here in this world as it now is, and as by His grace it is to be made better through our completer faithfulness; but our theology will live and convince of its higher truth not so much through controversy with other forms of thought as through the demonstration of our positive religious life, both in the fellowship of worship and the honourable doing of the world's work.

By THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

III.—THE BARBARIAN.

I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, both to the wise and the foolish. —Rom. i. 14.

IN previous sermons I have spoken of the relationship between Christianity and the religions respectively of Greece and Rome. The influence in each case was mutual. Both parties were affected by the contact. The Gospel was an advent to the Greeks, a message of glad news, a confirming and strengthening truth, a disclosure of conscience and the meaning of suffering and self-sacrifice, a revelation of God and immortality. On the other hand, Greek thought told its story on Christianity, giving it a philosophic basis, a rational as well as a dogmatic or spiritual foundation, supplying it with a theological system, providing the doctrine of the Trinity, and ultimately the Nicene and Athanasian creeds. Similarly the Gospel was an advent to Rome. It brought gentleness, lowliness, gladness, and democratic sympathies to Stoicism, and relieved the weight of its stern gloom. Yet, from Rome, elements good and evil entered the Church. To that source she was chiefly indebted for her organisation, her hierarchy, her connection with the State, and ultimately her aristocratic claims and ideals. Rome avenged itself on Christianity by Imperialising it. For a time, at any rate, Caesar in a real sense dethroned Christ, and the spirit of ascendancy displaced that of brotherhood.

Before I pass on to speak of the relationship of the Gospel to the third and greatest religion of that time, namely, Judaism, I would like to say something of the beliefs and temper, and their effect upon Christianity and Christianity's effect upon them, of the heathen multitudes up and down the Empire, who were despised as "Gentiles" by the Jews, and contemptuously called "barbarians" by the Greeks and Romans. Both these terms are significant. The "Gentiles" were the races other than the chosen people of God, and, of course, included the Greeks and Romans. The "barbaroi" were the babblers, of the peoples which did not speak Greek or Latin, and included, therefore, the Hebrews. They are equally terms of exclusion and sectarian bitterness, and evidence of the pride and hatred and consequently the ignorance of each other displayed by the leading nations of the ancient world.

But St. Paul welcomed both Gentiles and barbarians into the Church. He refused to limit his converts to Jews. He called himself the Apostle to the Gentiles, made it his particular mission to reach those who were outside the pale of Judaism. Nor did he confine his attention to Greeks and Romans. He laboured among the barbarians also, and he actually coupled the barbarian with the Greek when he said, "I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians," though he drew a distinction, and a just distinction, between them by adding the words "both to the wise and to the foolish." Compared with one another the Greeks were "wise," and the barbarians "foolish." Yet the Apostle confessed himself a debtor to the latter also. To uneducated, uncultivated men, who babbled in an unknown tongue, the great preacher acknowledged that he owed something. How good and true that is! What a proof of his greatness and the breadth of his teaching! The Greek philosopher regarded the ignorant person without languages as hopeless; between his "wisdom" and the other's "foolishness" a great gulf was fixed. It mattered not that the barbarian was a man, that he had a language of his own of extreme interest to the philologist, that he had a character of his own valuable to the student of anthropology, that he had, besides, all those deeper qualities in which the best-trained intellects share the common longings, and sufferings and joys of human kind. He was ill-informed, and that was sufficient. He belonged on that account to an inferior and foreign sphere. Such an attitude sufficiently demonstrates the littleness of the philosophy. A really great thought of life is expansive, inclusive, and democratic, spreads beyond the barriers of territory and race, has insight into strange conditions and customs and complexions, and grows by intercourse with men. Paul's Gospel made him feel a kinship with the barbarian, a bond of connection between himself and the man whose tongue was rude and unlettered, an interest in him as a child of God and a brother human being. A truth indeed, is to be measured as to its truthfulness by the way it fastens us to men and things, strengthening our interest in the common and the mundane, and bringing out of it the beautiful.

Nor was St. Paul mistaken in the goodness he looked for from these people. On more than one occasion he was at their mercy, and his trust was not misplaced. I read for our second lesson the description in the book of Acts of his landing from the shipwreck on the island of Malta. He escaped, wet and cold, to the shore, and found himself among barbarians; but instead of being robbed and put to death he was taken care of. An eye-witness probably Luke, the Apostle's physician and inseparable companion tells the story; and he says, apparently to his own surprise, that "the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness, for they kindled a fire and received us every one because of the rain and the cold." This is remarkable testimony. The cruel wrecker spirit, which was almost everywhere a feature of paganism, and which lingers yet about our own coasts, due partly to the superstitious belief that the victims of the sea and the storm were hated by the gods, was in this instance, at any rate, checked by feelings of pity. And it is the more noteworthy because the Maltese belonged to a race with an evil reputation. They were of Carthaginian and Phœnician descent, of the stock that in Africa and Palestine used to offer human sacrifices, making their children, in the language of the Bible, "pass through the fire" to Baal. Nevertheless, they could when occasion offered, show hospitality to strangers.

In spite, too, of their race, which is denounced by Homer as bitterly as by the Hebrew prophets, these islanders had the naïveté, the childishness of mind, which is a pleasing trait in nearly all savage peoples, and not unakin to Christian lowliness. They were ready to believe what was told them, willing to listen and to be taught, grateful for kindnesses done to them.

When St. Paul departed, having cured some sick folk among them, they loaded him and the company with presents. We are reminded of the Syro-Phœnician woman whom Jesus met by the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. When our Lord, trying her faith, said he was only sent to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and, employing the language customary among the Jews towards Phœnicians, declared he could not take "the children's bread and cast it to the dogs," she replied, with a meekness that completely won his heart, "Yea, Lord, but the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from the table." This willingness to be thought little or nothing of, the wonderment of untutored and unspoiled minds in the presence of what they cannot understand, and know they are unfit to appreciate, is always touching, and a mark of possible growth and development denied to the pseudo-civilised and the proud. The savage state, of course, has nothing really ideal about it. Rousseau's exaggerated praise belongs to the "windy sentimentalities" of the eighteenth century. There are none more easily betrayed into vices, more liable to the sins of civilisation, than the simple, isolated, untried primitive dwellers in the mountains and woods. At the same time, if the right teacher comes along, the unsophisticated heart is a virgin soil for his influence. The history of the Gospel everywhere bears witness to the fact. Christianity took swifter and deeper root among the Gentiles than among the Jews, among Gauls and Goths and Lombards than among Greeks or Romans. Jesus Christ himself commended the Samaritan, put him higher than the Levite and the Pharisee; and in the forefront of his teaching, at the head of the Sermon on the Mount, first among the Beatitudes, he set the virtue of a modest, teachable, childlike temper: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Healthy, primitive instincts are animal rather than spiritual, and are of little moral worth; but they are more likely to grow into Christian graces than the stunted righteousness and ceremonial virtue of the Jew, or the proud self-abnegation of the Stoic. There was more hope of the Barbarians of Malta than of the decadent populations of Rome and Pompeii. Have you ever read the Germania of Tacitus? It was written some twenty years after St. Paul's death, and was the work of a Roman historian who wanted to shame his fellow-countrymen. Tacitus says in this book, in effect, and we should remember that he was both a non-Christian and one who looked upon the Gospel as a revolutionary superstition: "Look at these Barbarians of Germany. You despise them because to you they speak gibberish, and go half-naked, and cannot read or write, and live in mud cottages; while you Romans are educated, and know Greek, and live in great cities, and worship in fine temples, and wear silk and purple. But, I tell you, they are better men than you are; for while you live in luxury and idleness and vice, they are honest and chaste and tell the truth. They honour their parents and love their wives, and are loyal to their kings, show hospitality to strangers, are not conceited and atheistic. And therefore something noble and glorious will come from this people when you Romans have fallen and perished in your sins."

And so it proved. Tacitus was right. Rome did fall in its sins, and upon the ruins of the Empire grew up the higher faith and civilisation of the Gothic nations, the great Medieval world in place of the classical, and after a time Protestantism instead of Romanism and the right of private judgment in lieu of papal authority.

But, let us remember, our northern and Protestant civilisation may have in it some of the weakness and falsehood of the Roman. I am sure it has. There is a mass of perverted sentiment and debauched intelligence which is no match for barbarous instinct. If the Boer War taught us any lesson it was surely this: that an effeminate, money-making, and gambling spirit may undermine an Empire if confronted by a manly, thrifty, God-fearing peasantry. I have confidence in the English race. To me it is almost inconceivable, in spite of some evil chapters in our history, that our vast commonwealth should follow the example of Rome; but if we are to maintain our integrity and power, we shall require a great deal more of the Gospel of Christ, both in our dealings with our fellow-countrymen and in our intercourse with mankind, than we have at present, far more honour and justice and patience and consideration and purity and kindness than yet exist in our private, civic, commercial and diplomatic life. For these virtues are the only powers capable of meeting the rude primitive instincts, or capable of producing a nobler fruit. The Christian and the Christian alone is the true and permanent successor to the Roman and the Goth.

But I must not be drawn along this interesting path from other features of my subject.

If the Barbarian had his rustic virtue and simpleness, he had also his dangerous superstitions, as abundantly appears in the record of the shipwreck at Malta. Firstly, it is said that a viper laid hold of the Apostle's hand as he was gathering sticks for the fire, and that the natives when they saw it said among themselves, "This man is surely a murderer, for though he hath escaped the sea justice hath not suffered him to live." Here is the heathen notion of retribution. If St. Paul and his company had been drowned they would have declared that they were sinners, and had received their punishment from the deities of the winds and waves. But being saved, their deliverance was regarded as an act of divine mercy, a providential rescue. "They must be good men," they reasoned, "to come out of the tempest unhurt." And therefore when, later, a poisonous reptile fastened on the hand of St. Paul they said, "He is a criminal after all. Vengeance has followed and caught him." Vengeance or justice, Diké as the Greek word is, was the pursuing Nemesis believed to underlie the misfortunes resulting from the operation of natural laws. The world was thought to be full of avenging furies which brought drought or famine or disease to wicked men, or would drop a beam upon their heads or crush them under a falling wall. Such was the primitive idea of the connection between sin and suffering. But Christianity, with the help of Science, has corrected this belief. We know that sickness and trouble and accident happen to the innocent as well as the guilty. The sins of men often bring more physical pain on others than on themselves. Good people suffer, and must suffer, in helping the world. Jesus Christ died on the cross as well as the thieves, and a vicarious atonement is made by every faithful disciple. We can only make men more at one with God by our self-sacrifice, by enduring what we have personally not deserved. The real Nemesis, the pursuing Diké, which no one can elude for a single instant, is within rather than without, a retribution on the mind and character, a punishment of the faculties, sensibilities, and intuitions of the soul. The words of the Apostle himself are spiritually and awfully true, The wages of sin is death—death to the heart, to the conscience, to the brain. So much sin is so much deadening of all that truly makes life—affection, honour, righteousness, noble ambition, joy, gratitude, worship, peace. Sin destroys these things and we perish. "He that soweth to the flesh shall reap corruption." And the corollary of this is that "he that soweth to the spirit shall reap life." The wages of righteousness is life. The equally inevitable payment of being just and holy and merciful, temperate and patient, modest, self-denying is increase of life—addition to character, deepening of feeling, elevation of thought, freedom, strength, influence.

Then observe the barbarian view of the divine. When the viper fell from St. Paul's hand in some way or other which, I do not doubt, science could explain, without poisoning him, the islanders said, "He is a god!" This is a way of looking at things which belongs to the childhood of faith. St. Paul is divine—why? Because he is good? No. Because he has opened the wondrousness and divineness of this ordinary world to men's dull, secular hearts? No. But because he is a magician, because he has some peculiar power over natural forces and occurrences. Christianity, again with the help of science, has corrected this notion. It has been a difficult task to do so, and it is by no means done yet. From the very beginning the Gospel was connected with the working of magic. Christ himself wrought cures in the bodies and minds of men which were considered by some, at any rate, signs of his messiahship. And there is no doubt that the barbarian belief in magic as from God influenced the early Church. The mysteries of the sacraments are probably of heathen origin, the results of a wise compromise with pagan rites and teaching. And at the present day orthodoxy is infected by the mode of thought which we see in those far-off inhabitants of Malta. Jesus is still regarded as the Son of God because he healed the sick and, as was supposed, walked upon the sea and quieted the storm. Without these miracles he would have no claim to be divine. But the higher, the truer view was also held from the first among the more spiritual of the Christians. We have it in the Fourth Gospel, where we read that Christ was divine because in him was the spirit of God. "He dwelt among us," says the writer, "and we beheld"—what? Not the wonders he performed like the magicians of the East, but "his glory, glory as of an only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." What wonderful insight is there! Jesus was divine because in him was the God-like mind, the spirit of goodness and kindness, justice and pity and truth, holiness, mercy, long-suffering and sacrifice, love unfeigned and unalterable, comforting and consoling all who turned to it, ready to forgive, the spirit of the World-Father. Here are the marks of relationship and kinship to God, the sign of a God-nature that may appear in us also and raise us from the dust, and lift us to a new level of dignity and spiritual excellence, opening to us a sublime new world of sacred reality and achievement

HOLD FAST BY LOVE.

HOLD fast by Love! This world is full of pain,
Of grievous wounds which none may heal again,
Of silent hunger veiled by patient smiles,
And unseen burdens dragged for weary miles;
If we could see in one brief sudden glare
The secret sorrows of men's hearts laid bare,
I think we should not dare to add again
By one harsh word to this dread sum of pain.

Hold fast by Love! Love only gives relief
To every piteous form of human grief;
Love only gives us gentleness enough,
Transforms the touch, which else we feel so rough;
Love gives us eyes to see and hearts to feel,
And longing for the power to bless and heal.
O! Heart of Love, Whose is Thy world's great grief, Breathe through our souls some power to give relief.

THE Committee appointed at the last Wesleyan Conference to draft a provisional constitution for the new Sunday-school department has, with practical unanimity, suggested a scheme which has been sent forward to the Conference. It appears to be a safe and conservative scheme; the President, ex-President and Secretary of the Conference, the Secretary of the Education Committee, the Book Steward, the Connexional Editor, the Secretary of the Temperance Committee, the Secretary of the Wesley Guild, and the Treasurer and Secretary of the department; together with twenty-six ministers and thirty-four laymen interested in Sunday-school work who, in the first instance, are to be appointed by the Conference, form the connexional committee. Each synod appoints a district Sunday-school Committee, consisting of six ministers and six laymen. The Conference will be asked to set apart from the Education Fund not less than £1,000 per annum to make Sunday-school furniture and outfit grants, and to appoint lecturers to visit districts and circuits with a view to improve Sunday-school organisation.

CONGREGATIONALISTS AND UNITARIANS.

SIR,—Perhaps the subject might as well be dropped after Mr. Thompson's letter: and yet, if it could be discussed a little longer, with average "suavity," something useful might come of it.

Mr. Thompson says: "The Congregationalist of the broader school, looking round on the theological position of the modern Unitarian, finds himself largely in agreement with it. And when he says so, and speaks of his attitude as new (and new it is to him) nothing is gained by the Unitarians retorting: 'This is what we have been proclaiming for half a century.'"

If the Congregationalist had said so, nothing that I have written on the subject would have been written. It was precisely because he did not say so, and because he said the reverse, that I intervened. So far as I can see, the Congregationalist who is largely in agreement with the Unitarian is nervously and tiresomely engaged in protesting that he is not. And, still further, he seems anxious to get into the Unitarians' house, and to make it out that they have no business there. This is the very opposite of that desirable rapprochement which Mr. Thompson hails.

It may be the old Adam in me which leads me to resent this, but I am impatient. The first movement towards a rapprochement ought to be the frank and pleasant admission that the Unitarian who has so long held the fort has done good service, and that he never merited the damnation that Evangelicalism threatened.

What I maintain is that every single article of the "New Theology's" creed has been ours for generations, set to the music of each special day, but essentially the same: and what I contend for is that this ought to be honestly acknowledged. That way rapprochement lies and I say this, not as demanding anything to gratify a feeling, but as one who is anxious to open up a path and clear the air.

Mr. R. J. Campbell is the best, straightest, and strongest representative of "The New Theology" men, and he stands bravely and resolutely for the universal Divine Immanence, and for the essential Divinity of Man: and this has altered everything on the Evangelical side. It has restored Jesus Christ to humanity: it has broken up the old exclusive idea of Inspiration: it has made the Bible a human document: it has dissipated the notion of an eternal and hopeless doom: it has altogether altered the outlook upon sin and salvation: it has, in fact, set up housekeeping in our old Unitarian garden. We are rejoiced beyond all telling, but we want to have the matter set right, and to have the thing squarely and manfully faced.

I hope all this is free from "bitter suavity." Mr. R. J. Campbell, in his late fiery sermon, pours out lava torrents of indignation, and calls many of his brother ministers "liars, liars, liars." The worst that I have said is that some of them are playing a rather shabby game. But God bless them, every one, and clear their vision and strengthen their nerves!

OUR MISSION.

SIR,—The weighty and eloquent words of Mrs. Ceredig Jones—all too briefly summarised in the report of the anniversary of the Van Mission—may well be pondered by all of us. What is our "mission"? What have we to offer humanity, at a time when ignorance, selfishness, greed, vice, crime, poverty, hatred and strife are all too evident—when the masses are being spiritually, morally and physically slain through want of self-control and ignorance of the laws of health? What have we to offer? A new theological dogma, or sundry repairs to the old dogmas? Believe these things (we say), and then all will be well. As if it were not this very wandering into the by-paths of theological speculation which has lain at the root of the ineffectiveness of Christianity to-day! Even Islam (itself a theological system) has grappled more seriously with social problems. Unitarianism, if we regard the spirit of it, means in the end a revolt against all dogma, a struggle for freedom only as a means of doing work and living the spiritual life.

If we were in possession of an absolutely correct theology (or explanation of the universe) to-morrow, what would happen? Our work, instead of being done would be not even begun. Indeed, the belief that we had a correct theology might do us harm, and lead us to fall down and worship it, as is the case with the Sikhs and their scriptures, or even with the Bible-worshippers among Christians. Surely, then, it's time mis-spent to be dogmatically asserting a theology which we cannot even prove to be true?

As to our hymns, I feel a sense of shame when I look at any of our collections. Nine-tenths of them offer to God a flattery which would be nauseating to any good man. It can be accounted for, of course. It is a survival an echo of Pagan hymns which at any rate were sincere. But can we expect intelligent people to come out from other churches and cut themselves off from society, for the sake of the privilege of singing hymns which do not express the thought and needs of to-day?

We have a mission, if we did but know it: It is to get men and women to live the life beautiful, and to live that life ourselves, even though we or they have little theology or none at all.

O. A. SHRUBSOLE.

THERE is a persuasion in the soul of man that he is here for cause, that he was put down in this place by the Creator, to do the work for which he inspires him, that thus he is an overmatch for all antagonists that could combine against him.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

SIR,—We invite the attention of your readers to the following statement respecting the meetings of the International Council which will be held at Boston, U.S.A., in September, 1907.

The meetings in London in 1901, at Amsterdam in 1903, at Geneva in 1905 were the largest and most representative gatherings of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers ever held. Those who were present realised that they belonged to a world-movement in religion.

The Unitarians of America are now busily occupied making arrangements for the meetings at Boston. The Rev. C. W. Wendte, the Secretary, says that their success is assured, if only a large number of representatives come over from Europe. A warm welcome is offered to visitors from Great Britain and Ireland. The land of Channing, Theodore Parker, Emerson, and Longfellow has many claims upon the gratitude and affection of English Unitarians.

It is to be hoped that as many of our people as possible will make the journey. It is especially desirable that a large number of our ministers should be enabled to go. The knowledge and enthusiasm which they would derive from a visit to America would prove an inspiration to them in their work ever afterwards.

Owing to the expense, it will be impossible for many ministers to attend, unless they receive some financial aid. You are aware that, with the view of assisting ministers, Dr. Herbert-Smith established a "Boston Conference Fund," and we have been appointed to co-operate with him in its administration. It is proposed that a grant, not exceeding £30, be made towards the expenses of each minister. Some well-to-do congregations may resolve to send their own ministers; but we plead for those to whom no such chance is likely to come. The Hon. Treasurer has already received in payments or promises £440: we hope this amount will soon be largely increased.

Will you help us? It will assist us greatly if a speedy response is made to this appeal, so that we may know to how many ministers we may offer the assistance of this special Fund.

Contributions may be paid to the Hon. Treasurer, Dr. C. Herbert-Smith, 3, Elm-court, Temple, London, E.C., or through one of the Local Treasurers; promises may be forwarded to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. B. Lawford, 12, New-court, Carey-street, London, W.C.

We are yours faithfully,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
W. COPELAND BOWIE,

Representatives of the International Council.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

THE present prosperity of the cotton trade is having its effect upon the congregation in this district. Whatever the drawbacks to their progress may be, that of slackness of work counts for very little; and from the financial point of view there is not much ground for complaint. Of course, there is in several localities the need of effort to raise money for congregational purposes; but such effort is not so hopeless as it sometimes is. Perhaps the most important undertaking of this kind is that which is being made at Chesham, Bury. The congregation there have always had a rather difficult task, but have managed to keep going with very fair success. The Education Act of 1902 involved them in great difficulties through their day school; and the only way to avoid being swamped altogether by ruinous expenses was to try and raise £2,000, in order, as it were, to capitalise some of their liabilities and strengthen their position. They are intending to hold a bazaar in February of next year, and are being helped by the four neighbouring congregations of Bury (Bank-street), Stand, Heywood, and Ainsworth. Friends up and down the country may take the assurance that the case of Chesham has been carefully inquired into, and is well deserving of support.

There is not much to tell of the regular work in the different localities. In congregations and Sunday schools there are plenty of busy folk, and much quiet work is being done in various ways. Perhaps in the course of another twelvemonths the effects of the Van Mission will be more evident than at present. Interest in that mission is rapidly awakening and increasing, and there is no telling what it will do. It has a great opportunity in this district if it never went anywhere else, and can, I think, rely on a welcome from our people wherever it comes.

On looking over the district I notice that there are several vacant pulpits, a fact which means, of course, the lack of regular leadership in congregational life. Newchurch, Rawtenstall, and Horwich are without ministers, and Blackburn (of which more presently) has not yet appointed one. Other vacancies are rumoured, but of them nothing can, of course, be said as yet. There is work to be done at all these places, and the delay is, as always, doing harm. Two of the vacancies are due to the removal of the former minister to another pulpit. That at Horwich is due to the death of the late Rev. R. C. Moore, whose loss was deeply felt in this district, where he was well known. He did a great deal, by quiet and patient work, to build up the cause at Horwich, and it is much to be desired that a successor may soon be found to take up the reins which dropped from his hands. The sympathy of many was awakened by that early death; and the like sympathy will be felt, too, by the friends of the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, in the sad bereavement that has befallen him.

To turn to a more cheerful subject, I refer to two places where a congregation has been recently started—Nelson and Blackburn. That at Nelson was begun more than two years ago, and has got over the flush and pride of novelty. The numbers in attendance keep up pretty well, and the advantage has been secured of a much better room for meetings than the one used at the first. I preached there last Sunday evening, and, in spite of the wild weather, there was a very fair attendance—between fifty and sixty. The Nelson people are not in a position, as yet, to maintain a settled minister, and probably will not be so for some time to come. They are dependent on supplies, and have found the neighbouring ministers and laymen very ready to help them. Perhaps some kind of working arrangement can be made to associate them more closely with the neighbouring congregation of Colne for ministerial oversight.

You were kind enough, in a recent number of the INQUIRER, to print an editorial note about Blackburn and the new movement which has been started there. I want to interest your readers in Blackburn, for the long-looked-for opportunity in that place seems at last to have come. Many years ago there was a Unitarian congregation there, but it came to an end, for reasons which belong to ancient history. Since 1867 there has been no representation of our religious principles in that town, and that fact has often been made the ground of reproach against the local association, whether justly or not is not now worth arguing. Rather more than a year ago, the Rev. C. Travers, of Preston, and some of the neighbouring ministers, made inquiries in Blackburn, and got together a number of persons desirous of joining in a movement to found a Unitarian congregation. In October of 1905 a room was engaged and services begun. They have been kept up ever since, and recently another room has been found, more convenient and less costly. There is the making of a good congregation in Blackburn, and the friends there have shown that they are ready to "stand their corner" in the matter of expense. It is highly desirable that an efficient minister should be put in charge of the movement; but to maintain one unaided is at present quite beyond the power of the congregation. They have applied to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and to the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and these two bodies have agreed to contribute £75 per annum each for two years towards the salary of a minister, on certain conditions, which have been accepted. The appointment of a minister will be subject to the approval of the two associations. At the end of two years the whole matter will come up for reconsideration. The North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, as some of your readers are well aware, is spending more than its income in meeting its existing liabilities in the matter of grants; it cannot, therefore, assist Blackburn out of its ordinary funds. A special Blackburn fund has been opened, and the committee invite promises of subscriptions for two years for that object. The treasurer of the Mission will be glad to receive such promises. I take pleasure in mentioning that the said treasurer, Mr. David Healey, enjoys at present the well-deserved honour of being Mayor of Heywood.

It has often been said that to have no Unitarian congregation in a great town like Blackburn is a disgrace to the body. Will those who have thought and said so come forward now and help to remove that disgrace? And will those who have declined to assist the Mission Committee in their present policy towards the grant-aided congregations show that they will support a forward movement? If the present opportunity in Blackburn be lost it may be long before there is such another, and lost it will be unless the Unitarians of this district and of the country generally (for it is the cause of all) resolve to back it up. When next you ask me for a Provincial Letter I hope I may be able to report a favourable response to the Blackburn appeal.

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant, of 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, S.E., writes;—"May I once more appeal through your columns in aid of my Poor's Purse? We are situated in the midst of one of the poorest and most squalid districts of London, and the demands for assistance are frequent. The help obtained at this season is not only devoted to the distribution of Christmas gifts, but also to cases of exceptional distress which may arise during the following year. During the past year some liberal helpers have passed away, and others are kindly urged to 'fill the breach.' Contributions of money, toys, left-off boots and wearing apparel (especially children's) will be gratefully received and acknowledged."

London: George's Row.—The Rev. F. Summers writes;—"Will you, please, allow me to appeal for assistance for the Poor's Purse and in other ways? I shall be very grateful for gifts not only from old friends of the Mission, but also from those who, as yet, have never assisted. In this district the very poor abound, and therefore, in addition to gifts of money, I shall be glad to receive new or cast-off clothing, boots, toys, books, &c. These may be sent to the Domestic Mission, George's Row, St. Luke's, London, E.C. (especially gifts in kind), or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, London, N."

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Dr. Read makes the following appeal;—"My Poor's Purse is now nearly exhausted, and, as there is a good deal of distress in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mission, especially in the case of those families where the bread winner is unemployed through no fault of his own, I shall be much obliged if the friends who kindly send their donations for the Poor's Purse and the various beneficent activities of the Mission will do so as soon as possible. I shall also be glad to receive any gifts of new or cast-off clothing or any kind of warm bed covering that friends may have to bestow, as these are often of more value to the poor than actual monetary help. Parcels should be sent to the Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W., and letters to my private address, 22, Willoughby-road, Hampstead, N.W."

London: Stamford-street, S.E.—The Rev. W. L. Tucker writes from the Blackfriars Mission, Stamford-street, S.E.;—"May I, through your columns, once again appeal on behalf of the Poor's Purse at our Mission? The near approach of Christmas finds many of our poorer neighbours in distress, and there is urgent need of practical sympathy if they are to be really helped. Your readers may rely on a wise use being made of their gifts."

Boston.—A crowded public meeting was held on Tuesday evening in the Assembly Rooms to protest against the misrule in the Congo State. A lantern lecture was given by Mrs. A. S. Harris, one of the secretaries of the London Branch of the Congo Reform Association, describing the condition of life on the Congo, and the devastating effect of King Leopold's boasted "work of moral and material regeneration." Ald. Wm. Bedford took the chair, and the meeting was organised by the Rev. W. Stoddart.

Bristol.—We recently reported the sermon of retrospect and thankfulness preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford on his completion of forty years of ministry at Lewin's Mead Chapel. The members took the occasion of their annual congregational soiree to make a presentation to Mr. Blatchford of a cheque and an illuminated address expressing their grateful appreciation of his devoted services as their minister and friend for all those years. Mr. A. H. Pope presided, and the presentation was made by Mrs. Harry E. Thomas, who said how greatly her husband regretted that he was unable to be present. Mr. Blatchford, in expressing his grateful thanks for their kindness, said that the remembrance of forty years filled him with reverent thankfulness; he could not have done it but for their loyalty, fidelity, and forbearance, and their generosity with which they had always treated him. His relations with them all in school and congregation had been of the happiest, and he rejoiced in the friendly associations he had with other ministers in the city. The kindness of his congregation would be an incentive to him to do better in the future than he had done in the past.

Chowbent.—On Saturday, November 24, a united meeting of the congregations of Chowbent, Leigh, Astley, and Croft was held to welcome the Rev. J. Harwood, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and a deputation from the North and East Lancashire Mission. The Rev. J. J. Wright presided, and expressed their great regret that Mr. John Harrison, whom they had also hoped to see with Mr. Harwood, had been prevented from coming. Mr. Wright then gave interesting particulars as to the various congregations represented, dwelling especially on the splendid work of the school and Band of Hope and Guild at Chowbent. Mr. Harwood spoke of the aims and works of the Association, and the Rev. R. T. Herford of the Mission. The Mayor of Heywood, Mr. D. Healey, also spoke, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding told of the Van Mission. Mr. Harwood preached on the following Sunday, and on Monday gave his lecture on India.

Exeter.—At a meeting of the congregation of George's Chapel, held Nov. 25, a letter was read from the Rev. T. W. Chignell, to the effect that, owing to his advanced age, he could not promise to preach every Sunday morning after the close of the present year. It was thereon decided that Mr. Chignell should preach as frequently as he could, and that a co-minister should be appointed to be answerable for the work of the chapel.

Horsham.—On Thursday, November 29, a very pleasant and successful sale of work was held in the school-room, opened by Mrs. Byles. The vote of thanks was moved by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and seconded by the Rev. G. Lansdowne; £28 was the result towards the cost of much needed church repairs. The school-room has recently been fitted with block gas lights, the gift of Mr. David Price, an improvement greatly appreciated.

Leeds.—On Saturday, December 1, the Leeds Unitarian Friendly Society held its forty-third annual tea and concert in the Priestley Hall. The Right Hon. Sir James Kitson, Bart., M.P., presided over the meeting, and was supported by the president of the Society, Mr. Chas. Stainer, and the Revs. Charles Hargrove, W. R. Shanks, and H. McLachlan. In an extremely characteristic address Sir James traversed the last fifty years, recalling many memories of exceptional interest to Leeds citizens, and in particular to members of the Mill Hill congregation. Referring to the Society, he, its founder, was delighted to observe its growth and usefulness, having now 352 members, and sound invested funds of £2,526. Last year's contributions amounted to £219 5s. 7½d., and the payments included £113 11s. for sick benefits, £12 for funeral, and £36 for medical attendance. Alluding to the objects of the Society, Sir James said it was formed, not only with the object of attaching to their congregation the young men and young women who were passing through the schools, but also with the hope that through it they might be better citizens.

Leeds: Holbeck.—A successful bazaar extending over three days has been held for the purpose of clearing off a small deficit, colour-washing the schoolroom, and augmenting the general fund. It was opened the first day by the Rev. C. Hargrove, on behalf of Miss Bulmer, who, unfortunately, was indisposed. Mrs. Cannon presided. On the second day Mr. J. T. Kitchen, chairman of the Church Committee, presided in place of Mr. G. E. Verity, who also was unable to attend through indisposition. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot opened the proceedings with an encouraging speech. The proceedings on the third day were given over to the young scholars, twenty-four of whom rendered a piece entitled "An Offering to the Queen," written for the occasion by the minister. The young people acquitted themselves excellently, and their offerings amounted to £5 12s. Mrs. Shanks presided. Despite very inclement weather on two out of the three days, the expectations of the promoters were fully realised, the total receipts exceeding £223.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—At the meeting of the Rathbore Literary Club on Thursday, November 29, Mrs. H. D. Roberts delivered a lecture upon "The Influence of Woman in Shakespeare." Colonel Goffey, J.P., presided. The lecturer opened by giving an instructive account of the position of women in Elizabethan times. Peeresses sat in Parliament, and women generally had the same advantages in education and in public service as men. These preliminary considerations were necessary for a full understanding of the parts played by women in the Shakespearean plays. The three women whom the lecturer thought to be of the highest type were Imogen, Hermione, and Miranda. The lecture was of surpassing interest, and was listened to with great attention. An interesting discussion followed, in which the chairman, Rev. J. C. Odgers, Mr. W. S. Cooke, and the secretary, took part. There were 53 present.

London: Highgate.—On Wednesday, Nov. 28, the Band of Hope, which is coming to the end of a very successful session, was visited by the Bermondsey Band of Hope Choir, who gave a very excellent entertainment, consisting of part songs, dialogues, recitations, and vocal solos, all of which were much appreciated by the audience. The performance of the Choir bore excellent testimony to the good work of its conductor, Mr. A. W. Harris.

London: Lewisham.—On Thursday, Nov. 29, there was a sale of useful articles and an entertainment, opened by Mr. John Harrison, with a few cheery words. The result was £50 added to the funds of the church. The ladies' committee had the sole management of affairs. A noticeable feature of the sale was the attendance of a good many Lewisham people who had not been known to fraternise with the congregation before.

London: Stamford-street.—On Wednesday evening, November 28, Miss Harriet M. Johnson, of Liverpool, delivered an address upon her recent visit to the World's Temperance Convention in Boston, U.S.A. To an interested audience she described the great reception and banquet in the Temple, at which over 1,000 delegates were present, and where the flags of the different uniting nations were conspicuous. The Hon. John D. Long, ex-Secretary of the Navy, was present, and spoke; and President Roosevelt sent a telegram welcoming the Convention. The Earl of Carlisle spoke on behalf of England, and Lady Carlisle was elected president of the World's Temperance Union. Miss Johnson dwelt upon the real good apparent from the existence of prohibition, and mentioned that the State of Texas, which they call over there the "Lone Star State," is expected to "go dry," which means vote prohibition, shortly, and she gave many quotations from the words of wisdom spoken by the leaders in this great working army. Here is one:—"There is more than one kind of heredity. Not only does a child inherit from its father and mother, but it inherits from society, and society is just as responsible as the parents." After a vote of thanks to Miss Johnson for her most interesting address had been proposed by Mr. Fred Welsh, seconded by Mr. Chick, and carried, Miss Ethel Bredall sang the "American national anthem," "America," which goes to the tune of "God Save the King," and the audience joined in our own National Anthem at the end. Mrs. Leighton Tucker was in the chair.

Loughborough.—On Saturday, Nov. 24, a meeting of teachers and workers connected with the Unitarian Sunday-schools of Leicester, Hinckley, and Loughborough, was held at the Victoria-street Chapel. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. H. Burgess. Mr. H. Cox, of the Great Meeting School, Leicester, read a paper on "The Present Position of Sunday Schools," in which he commented on the lack of good manners and reverence so noticeable in many of the children and young people of to-day and the desirability of parents and teachers combining to remedy the evil. He thought some such ceremony as that of confirmation in the church, or baptism amongst the Baptists, was desirable and useful for marking the entrance of young people into the church as full members. A discussion followed and Mr. Cox was thanked for his paper, on the motion of the Rev. A. H. Thomas, seconded by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins. After tea the session was resumed, and Miss Edith Gittins, of Leicester, presented her report as visitor of the district Sunday-schools. The report recorded much good work, and indicated points where improvement was possible and desirable. The report was adopted, and Miss Gittins thanked for her services. Two brief papers followed, one by Miss Jackson, of Hinckley, and the other by Miss Dexter, of Leicester, both giving impressions of the summer school for Sunday-school teachers, at Manchester College, Oxford, last July.

Manchester: Broughton.—A course of special doctrinal lectures by the Rev. Henry Dawtre has recently been warmly appreciated by large congregations, which included many strangers of the district.

Manchester District Association.—At a meeting of the Governing Body held in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, on the 4th inst., an application to join the Association was received from the Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school Congregation. On the motion of the President, Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, seconded by Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, and supported by the Rev. Charles Peach, the application was welcomed and unanimously approved, the membership of Lower Mosley-street with the Association being thereby recognised. The best wishes of the Governing Body were expressed to the young congregation and its devoted minister, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. With this accession the Association now numbers twenty-three non-subscribing congregations in the Manchester District.

Midland Ministers.—On Monday week the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That the Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties assembled at Wolverhampton on November 26, 1906, desire to express to the members of the House of Commons of whom they are constituents their deep regret at the vital changes made in the Education Bill by the House of Lords, and their trust that the House of Commons will support the Government in carrying a measure which will restore all those features which will give public control, abolish all religious tests for teachers, and put on a solid basis the whole system of national education, doing justly by all and showing preference to none."

Newport, Mon.—On Thursday, Nov. 22, the Rev. John Page Hopps lectured in the Town Hall Assembly Room on "The Religious Value of the Unitarian Faith." Mr. G. H. Llewellyn presided over an audience numbering fully 250, who followed the address with the utmost interest and appreciation. As the same lecture is to be delivered in other towns, it would be unfair to attempt any summary or description of it here, beyond saying that it was marked by all the veteran lecturer's well-known ability and vigour. The work at Newport is proceeding steadily under the Rev. S. Burrows, who has recently inaugurated week-evening classes and lectures for the winter months.

Skipton.—Following upon the Van Mission at Skipton, a course of five lectures has been arranged under the auspices of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union on "Unitarianism and Modern Thought" at the Temperance Hall. Three have already been delivered as follows:—Nov. 22, Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman on "God—Atheism, Agnosticism, and Theism"; Nov. 27, Rev. W. Rosling on "Man: His Origin, Environment, and Free Will"; Dec. 5, Rev. John Ellis on "Jesus—from Nazareth to Calvary." Much interest is manifested by a steadily increasing audience. The kindest feeling has been shown by the fact that prominent gentlemen connected with orthodox churches (Wesleyan, Congregationalist, Church of England), have willingly consented to preside at the meetings.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS number of the INQUIRER, it will be seen, is largely devoted to literature, though other things are not neglected. Next week we hope to have a good Christmas number.

WE regret to hear that Mr. Stopford Brooke will be prevented by indisposition from preaching at Hampstead to-morrow evening.

A MEMORIAL tablet was last Sunday unveiled in the High Pavement Chapel at Nottingham, bearing the following inscription:—"In loving and grateful remembrance of Richard Acland Armstrong, minister of this congregation from 1869 to 1884, during which period the present chapel was built. He was a fearless champion of the right, and combined profound and devout thought with a life of high endeavour and noble work. Born February 5, 1843. Died January 4, 1905. Erected by Members of the High Pavement Chapel, 1906." The tablet, which is described as of marble, bronze, and translucent enamel, is erected near the pulpit, and was unveiled after morning service by Mr. Jesse Hind, who was closely attached to Mr. Armstrong during the whole of his Nottingham ministry. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in the course of his sermon that morning, said there was a profound saying that "God is the place of souls," and it was that thought which gave not only solemnity but divine exaltation and joy to the commemoration of the faithful departed.

"WE unveil only a visible memorial to-day," said the preacher, "but still unveiled and hidden in the hearts of grateful men is another and a nobler memorial—the remembrance of what he taught and did and was, the quickening influence of his life, the spiritual effect of his kindling words, the lucid thought that disclosed the vision of his God and our God. To many who wandered in the darkness of doubt he brought light, love, and life. On our roll of ministers are many names of men who came directly under his influence, and I rejoice to see they are represented here to-day. To many who were crushed down to the dust by the weight of all the woe and the misery of mankind he spoke the fortifying word that made them stand erect again in their manhood to do battle for the right. No one felt more compassionately and poignantly than he the pain and sorrow and sin of modern society, yet through it all he maintained a brave and manly heart." Having quoted a passage from one of the last of Mr. Armstrong's sermons, Mr. Thomas spoke of the absolute sincerity of his ministry, his impassioned service of truth and righteousness, his profound pity for the poor, the down-trodden and degraded, and concluded with an appeal to his hearers to revive the testimony of their former minister, and take up his prophecy of international peace and universal brotherhood. Both Hope-street Church in Liverpool, and the High Pavement now have their Armstrong memorial.

A PUBLIC conference on Woman's Work and Wages in Liverpool was held in Hope Hall on Tuesday evening in that city. The Conference was organised by the Hope-street Church Social Problem Circle, which during the past year has been giving serious attention to the problem of sweated industries. A recent address on the subject by the Rev. H. D. Roberts has been published (Liverpool Opinion Office, 9-11, Copperas-hill: 1d.). Alderman W. B. Bowring presided at the Conference, and addresses were given by the Rev. Joseph Anderton, Miss Eleanor Rathbone, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, and Mr. John Edwards. These last two moved and seconded the following resolution, which, after some discussion, was unanimously passed:—

"That this public meeting and conference of men and women of Liverpool convinced of the imperative need of public action in the matter of women's work and wages in Liverpool, and in the country at large, is of opinion (a) that the Government should be strongly urged to extend the necessary and humane provisions of the Factory Acts to all outworkers by including domestic workshops in the regulations; (b) that a wages board be set up in each industrial district, the duty of which shall be to arbitrate and fix a minimum rate of pay in all cases of underpaid or sweated labour; and (c) further pledges itself to bring by every legitimate means moral pressure to bear on such employers, and to encourage the women and girls to organise so as to help themselves."

The Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury of Wednesday devoted a sympathetic leader to the subject. The Liverpool Courier had a capital report.

MANY friends will have heard with great concern of the serious accident which befell the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson at Gee Cross on Monday week. At noon on that day, visiting a sick member of his congregation, on turning to leave, he must have caught his foot on the top stair of the steep, dark staircase of the cottage house, for he fell forward, down the whole flight on to the asphalt floor below. His whole weight came upon his arm, causing dislocation of the left shoulder and crushing the internal muscles of the arm. He did not lose consciousness, but was in a state of collapse for two or three hours and in great pain; only after that time, when he was sufficiently recovered, could he be removed in the ambulance to his home. When Ajax or any other man of mighty muscle puts a shoulder out of joint neither he nor the surgeons are likely soon to forget what they have to face, and it was only at noon on the following day that they succeeded in getting the bone back into its right place. We are thankful to hear of daily improvement in Mr. Dowson's condition, but he will have to give up all engagements for the present, and will probably go to Switzerland next month for a few weeks. The warmest sympathy of a host of friends will watch with Mr. Dowson during his convalescence, and go with him into the New Year to that needful rest.

GOD is in all that liberates and lifts;
In all that humbles, sweetens, and consoles.

LITERATURE.

SHORT NOTICES.

A Treasury of English Literature (from the beginning to the eighteenth century), selected and arranged with Translations and Glossaries by Kate M. Warren; with an Introduction by Stopford A. Brooke. This book, the result of years of patient work, is designed especially as a companion to Mr. Stopford Brooke's well-known "Primer of English Literature," but will be valued by lovers of literature independently of such special use. At the moment we can only say that we are delighted to have such a book, for which Mr. Brooke has written a worthy Introduction, and congratulate Miss Warren on the completion of her task. (A. Constable & Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Religion and Experience, by J. Brierley, B.A., meets us with a most welcome portrait of the author, "J. B." of the Christian World, who thus collects into another volume a fresh store of his ever-welcome articles, 26 of them, with an Introduction, in which "the endeavour is made to sketch a philosophy of experience and to show its relation to the Christian faith of to-day." (James Clarke & Co. 6s.)

Bee Songs and other Verse, by William George Tarrant, B.A., we had the pleasure of welcoming last year, and are very glad to note that a second edition is now issued, just in time for Christmas, and this time tastefully bound in cloth. (Philip Green, 5 Essex-street, W.C. 1s.)

The Seven Wayfarers, a Tale for Children, Old and Young, by Dorothea Hollins, comes to us just in time for Christmas, to be enjoyed, we trust, by many Christmas children, but chiefly, we imagine, by those of maturer years, who will appreciate the wise lessons of its allegory and the beautiful verses. How holiday children take to the story we may find an opportunity of testing and of reporting before long. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Rosebud Annual, 1907, for the amusement of the little ones is as good as ever, with some new features that are welcome. (J. Clarke & Co. 4s. or 3s.) And with it comes Animal Fun, Pictures by Louis Wain and others. (J. Clarke & Co. 1s.)

Slings of Fortune, by Jonathan Nield, we read with much interest, remembering with gratitude the author's admirable Guide to Historical Novels. But as a novelist himself Mr. Nield has hardly yet found his feet. The story is wholesome, and the episode on the Cornish coast vividly pictured, but admirable as it is in its intention the book does not take hold and convince. (H. R. Allenson. 6s.)

The Traveller's Joy, by Ernest Frederic Pierce, has received, as it deserves, a warm welcome from lovers of the open country, and of healthy, unconventional human nature. The story is slight, but one is held delighted, amid its scenes, in the charming little roadside inn, among the meadows, and on the slopes of the South Downs. There is humour, too, mingled with its great romance. (Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.)

My Uncommonplace Book, by C. T. Champion, M.A., at once justifies its title by photographs of the author's school and college (Charterhouse and Oriel), printed in odd places, just inside the cover. What he has collected into his book is an amusing medley, with a good deal of clever university wit in various languages. There are epigrams, epitaphs, and a number of translations and other poems, largely humorous, but others serious, as Goethe's "Ueber allen Giffeln," of which there is a translation into Greek; and the author offers a Latin translation of Ellerton's hymn, "The day Thou gavest, Lord, is ended." Here, on the other hand, is a verse, not serious, by the late Bishop Creighton:—

The rain it raineth every day
Upon the just and unjust feller,
But more upon the just, because
The unjust takes the just's umbrella.

Scholars will find uncommon pleasure in the book. (Sherratt & Hughes, Manchester. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Pilgrims' Way, "A Little Scrip of Good Counsel for Travellers," chosen by A. T. Quiller-Couch, is a book of serious intent, daintily produced, not a country holiday book, but selected verse and prose on Childhood, Youth, Love Divine and Human, Marriage and Children, House and Garden, Work and the Daily Round, Divinity in Man, Nature, the Citizen, Wisdom, Praise and Prayer, Charity, Bereavement and Consolation, Age, Death, and other subjects before that last. Wordsworth's "Intimations" and Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra" are included, and many less known shorter pieces. Passages from Ecclesiasticus and Job are included, and a bit from Jeremy Taylor on Prayer, but also a thing as modern as I. Zangwill's parable of Peterkin's Pudding, following Pascal on "Ambitions." A book for quiet leisure. (Seeley & Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Archbishop Laud and Priestly Government, by Henry Bell, M.A., of the Middle Temple, presents a historical study of the great Churchman from a point of view very different from that of Newman and the Oxford Tractarians. As a man self-opinionated and fixed in his convictions, he is described by the author as one who lived an isolated life, "out of touch with all that was great and noble in the aspirations of his age," of disposition unsocial and unsympathetic, hardened into intolerance by a priestly education, one who forced to the front his ideal of the Church in which the bishops were the nobles and the laity the serfs. "It was not the Apostolic Church, but the Church of the Middle Ages, with its priestly superstition, and its priestly authority, which, in spite of the Reformation, he sought again to introduce." (Constable & Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Among other books we have received the following:—

BOOKS AND A CONFESSION.

Qui s'excuse s'accuse. But we cannot help it! Towards the end of a year, and seeing clearly what may still be accomplished and what is now impossible, we have to acknowledge that here are some books which we had hoped to make the subject of full review, which must now be passed over with this brief reference.

Women's Work and Wages, a Phase of Life in an Industrial City, by Edward Cadbury, M. Cécile Matheson, and George Shann, M.A. (Fisher Unwin: 6s.), we received and have looked into with the keenest interest. It is another of those thorough and painstaking studies of the actual facts of life in great centres of industry, which are doing so much to compel people to attend to social questions and seek for more effectual means of helping those classes of workers who have the hardest lot. This book, which is concerned with the women workers of Birmingham, should be placed side by side with Mr. B. S. Rowntree's "Poverty: A Study of Town Life," dealing with the city of York, and be made the subject of careful consideration.

Even earlier in the year we received Mrs. Humphry Ward's last novel, Fenwick's Career (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.), which we had followed with unfailing interest through the numbers of the Century Magazine, in which it first appeared. The nemesis of the first deception and the growing tragedy of the disappointed artist life is told with great power, and side by side with it the pathetic story of Eugénie de Pastourelles; but the most delightful touch came into the story, to our mind, with the brightness and healthy vigour of the daughter, when they were back from Canada, and she heard for the first time of her father. "But—oh! Mummy, Mummy!—this between laughing and crying—"I do guess you were just a little fool!—I guess you were!"

Then we had also the first volume of Prolegomena of A Grammar of New Testament Greek, based on W. F. Moulton's Edition of G. B. Winer's Grammar, by James Hope Moulton, of the Didsbury Wesleyan College (T. & T. Clark. 8s. net), practically a new book, of the greatest value, of which a second edition was very quickly demanded. "Unquestionably, the standard Grammar of New Testament Greek," said Dr. Marcus Dodds, while Professor Deissmann was equally emphatic in his praise.

Of that refreshing book on the religious education of children, The Training of the Twig, by the Rev. C. L. Drawbridge, M.A., of Hampstead, we spoke with much pleasure at the time of its appearance early last year, but we have since had three other books of his: Old Beliefs and New Knowledge (Longmans. 1s. 6d. net), Is Religion Undermined? (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net), and Religious Education: How to Improve It (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net), all of which, we are confident, will reward careful reading. They will be found helpful towards the realising of the truth of a spiritual faith. Here is a timely warning from the last of these books: "One can only teach that which a child can learn. To attempt to teach him what he cannot learn is not only to fail to teach him anything, but also to give him a permanent distaste for what he would otherwise have been interested in later on. Teachers whose zeal outstrips their discretion sometimes bore children so persistently by habitually making the above-mentioned mistake, that they teach their pupils to permanently dislike religion."

And finally there is The English Hymnal (Oxford University Press. London: Henry Frowde. 1s. net), which the Bishops' condemnation makes one the more eager to study. But to this we must really manage to return.

EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE.*

THIS little book on Eucken's Philosophy is of quite exceptional interest and importance. It is published with the assistance of a grant from the Hibbert Trustees, who have evidently recognised that Eucken's Philosophy makes for the promotion of "Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form." This is the first considerable attempt to bring home to thoughtful minds in England the teaching of Eucken, and Professor Boyce Gibson is to be heartily thanked and congratulated on the clear, simple, and impressive way in which he has interpreted the thoughts of Eucken upon the great problems of existence. Readers of THE INQUIRER will remember some articles on Eucken by Dr. Tudor Jones which appeared in these columns in January last. They were necessarily slight and introductory, but they will have awakened an interest which the present book will do much to increase.

In Eucken's Philosophy we meet with the most definitely religious teaching since that of Dr. Martineau. Here is a German, trained in all the best and severest traditions of the schools, a profound student of preceding thinkers, and an original and powerful thinker, who believes in God and the soul and in Free Will. He is essentially a spiritual philosopher, and a man of the world in the best sense of that much-abused phrase. He cares for life more than for thought. He knows the academic point of view, and is learned enough not to despise it as some original and untrained minds will do; but he sees also its limitations and realises that philosophy is the concern of every man, and that it has to do with life in the largest, fullest sense. Broadly speaking, there are three schools of Philosophy represented to-day, which may be described as Naturalism, Idealism, and Humanism. Naturalism teaches the priority of sense over spirit. "All the inner properties of mind, all qualitative differences in experience, are explained as the inevitable result of the variations in relative position of infinitesimal elementary centres of force." "Hence, when naturalistic theory proceeds to develop its hold upon life, it is able to assert that the one main problem of life is to seek out its true relation to the environment. With this maxim disappears the last claim of the spiritual to have any initiative or any value of its own." "The real strength of Naturalism," says Mr. Gibson, "lies in the weakness of the world's spiritual life. Naturalism is most formidable when it takes its point of departure, not theoretically from mere sense-data, but practically from the inertness and slavishness of the spiritual life of the human community."

"Eucken's work," he says finely, "may be briefly described as a philosophical crusade against every form of spiritual lethargy and indifference. There must be a definite break with all that binds us to the conventional, unprincipled life that has grown easy to us, and we must not return to the old ways, save as citizens of a new spiritual world." It is this intensely ethical and spiritual note which will attract all those interested in religion to Eucken. He vindicates man's freedom as a spiritual being, and in doing so breaks with the orthodox schools of Idealism.

"There is, indeed, no more satisfying defence of freedom than that involved in the whole development of Eucken's philosophy," says Professor Gibson. "It is as a philosophy of life and freedom that we must look to Eucken's work for inspiration." "It is the vindication of our personality. It implies a break with every attempt, theoretical or practical, to interpret personal life either as a mere prolongation of the natural life which has its roots in sense-experience, or as a mere incident in the life of God. It asserts the freedom of the personal agent, and proclaims that the relation of man both to Nature and to God can be understood only in the light of man's free agency."

"It is fundamental with Eucken that doubt is cured not by meditation but by action. Meditation by itself may well give good answers to questions that have an academic interest only. The questions which mere meditation suggest may be answered by mere meditation, but the problem of our life-process can be solved by the life-process only. It is spiritual heroism and not an endless meditation that solves the problems of our life." All this is not a condemnation of reason or indifference to the meditative or theorising side of life. It is insistence that if you would explain life you must first of all live the life to be explained. The life of the spirit is more important than the life of thought which tries to understand the life of the spirit. If thought is in full activity without that inner life of freedom and love to work upon, it will come by itself to disastrously false conclusions. Spiritual effort is of more importance than theoretical reasoning, and is the presupposition of any satisfying results which may be obtained by thought. "If freedom, immortality, and God enter into our life at all, then on Eucken's theory, it is reason itself which helps the life to realise their presence, their meaning, and their value, and in proportion as they are fundamental for life, they become the fundamental problems of the reason." "It is Eucken's central merit to have discussed the fundamental significance of the religious categories. What he has most at heart is the success of the great cause for which his philosophy contends—the establishment of a human culture that shall express, through its whole complex fabric the heroism and devotion of the spiritual life."

We have quoted largely from passages which represent the spirit in which Eucken approaches his problem, because it is impossible to deal here in detail with the teaching itself. As we read this book we become ever more conscious of the presence of a man with a noble personality, and a large, rich life of experience, a man with a strenuous and heroic spirit a man, not only thinking but living with all his might.

Professor Boyce Gibson is not a mere disciple; he points out the weak places in Eucken's thought, and is not afraid of differing from him at times. But he has a real reverence for Eucken, as well as a most thorough understanding of his writings. That union of reverence and unprejudiced study is needful for the right representation of such a man. This little book should be very widely read. It is not only a help to our philosophical knowledge and thought, it is an appeal to that which is best and most heroic in our nature.

H. G.

IN THE INQUIRER of September 22 we offered a first word of welcome to Mr. Jupp's book, and have been too long in returning to it for further notice. Into this book, we then said, "a man's heart has been put, and the heart of a man who knows 'the healing grace of Nature.'" That is its great charm, which will ensure for it an entrance, as with the touch of helpful, gracious friendship, into the mind and heart of many who have fallen into confusions of thought and hopelessness amid the darker problems and the conflicts and follies of this present time; while to those who need no conversion it will come as the happy greeting of a comrade in that beautiful new world of faith and hope and love, in which they and he together have found a home.

Early in the second chapter, on "The Kinship of Nature," we read:—"It is surely one of the most significant facts of the modern world that as the Universe has widened to man's view he has learned to make himself more at home in it. Though strange and mysterious still—sometimes so appalling in its vastness—it is no longer a hostile region, ruled by jealous unseen Powers that watch to do him wrong, or to find him lax in offering sacrifice at their shrines. It is his own world wherein, for a while, he may dwell with other creatures, in peace and love—an observer and yet also an actor in the drama of existence. The old feeling of alienation and estrangement, which so long oppressed the human heart, is passing away. The earth is no more under a curse, and none need think of himself as an outcast of paradise, or a forlorn pilgrim destined to wander and weep, to sin and repent, till he is translated to a more permanent abode in heaven or hell. Here and now man is a free citizen of the universe—a member of the large and wonderful household of life. And in learning this he has become aware of a quite sacred kinship between himself and all other beings who share life with him here. A spirit of unity and harmony and social brotherhood begins to prevail on the earth."

"No longer harassing ourselves with vain theories of an external supramundane deity, limited and personal, distant and hard to please, we discover the Divine within the natural and human—the all-creative, all-inspiring Presence, whose One and Everlasting Life flows and pulsates through the manifold forms of that real universe which is our home. Our thirst for God is the longing of the real within us for the real which is within the whole; and in returning to Nature, in fearlessness and love we drink at the living fountains and are satisfied."

Such is the faith in which Mr. Jupp sets himself to show what the religion of Nature and of Human Experience may be to us in this living present, and how it may be realised with a new gladness and quietness of heart by those for whom old beliefs and forms of worship and ritual observance have fallen away. The permanent things of the Spirit remain amid all changes of thought, and with growing knowledge of the universe and deeper experience of human life they are there for fuller apprehension and the perfecting of fellowship with God and man. That, as we understand him, is what Mr. Jupp means by religion. His book is full of encouragement and the beautiful simplicity of wholesome thought and pure affection.

The chapters on Wordsworth, "Seer and Poet," and on the Poet Naturalists, Thoreau, and such lovers of animals as Seton Thompson, W. H. Hudson, and W. J. Long, are among the most delightful in the book; and then comes the chapter on "The Appeal of Beauty," from which we quoted in our former article. In the presence of beauty throughout the universe, and the moving power of its silent, but all-pervading witness, Mr. Jupp rightly sees Divine significance. "The Spirit of Creation," he says, "realises itself in Beauty." This we find indubitable, that beauty is the expression of a supreme Joy in creation, and a message to us from the Giver of all life, bidding us also rejoice. But when Mr. Jupp goes on to find in the realising of such beauty in human life, also "the true ethical impulse—the guiding and satisfying aim of the ideal good," we are not so sure that we can follow him. "To make life beautiful, in all its relations and activities," he says "is the real and final significance of moral endeavour." But surely there is more than this in the instant claim of moral obligation, and a greater urgency in the appeal of truth and righteousness. The demand for loyalty to the highest ideal of personal character goes beyond the æsthetic demand for harmonious beauty, and it is here, as it appears to us, that we are brought most surely to the conviction that we are called into living fellowship with the Eternal, who is Himself Truth and Righteousness and Love. It is not simply the general order of things which makes the universe, in which we recognise a perfect fitness and beauty, which claims our submission and secures our peace, but the One eternal Power, Source of all that order, steadfast in the purpose of unchanging good, the "Beautiful of Ancient Days," God Himself, who would draw us into the communion of the higher life, as children with our Father; and it is obedience in that direct personal sense, in harmony with the supreme Righteousness and Love, which we are called upon to render. It is true, no doubt, that they who learn to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with their God, are thereby realising the perfect beauty of life; they are also securing its truest happiness; but neither beauty nor happiness is "the final significance of moral endeavour" but simply obedience to the Highest. It is a growing life in which we find ourselves involved, in which we are led from step to step of moral achievement to yet more perfect vision and new aspiration and endeavour. The constant thread in such a spiritual life is that it is not of ourselves, but we are in God's hand; He calls us to that obedience and gives us that great joy. To be doing the Father's will, in a growing perfectness of human fellowship, that, we should say, is the final significance of moral endeavour. We have felt, in reading Mr. Jupp's chapter on "The Ethical Ideal," as we did in his former essay on "The Forgiveness of Sins and the Law of Reconciliation," that there is something more in the conflict with moral evil than he has expressed. There appears to us danger of losing the true grip of life for moral progress, and the conquest of sin in the world, when moral evil is represented simply as a failure to come up to the ideal, or something ugly introduced where there should be harmonious beauty. There is a question of personal loyalty or treachery, a rebelliousness of will to be overcome, a cleansing and subduing in urgent conflict, through which a man must often pass to the higher life. We may be rested in our conflict through a sense of the great calmness of Nature, but we must fight our own battle through, and then give ourselves in complete surrender to the Father's will.

We shall, perhaps, make our meaning clearer if we quote another passage from Mr. Jupp's chapter on "The Faith of the Religion of Nature," which we are disposed to question only at one point. "Love," he says, "is the final interpreter. And it is when, after using our best powers of analysis and judgment, we draw near to the Living Soul of things and let the Spirit of life 'bear witness with our Spirit,' it is then that, according to our capacity of reception, the inner significance of it all is made real to us. It is of this experience that faith is born—the faith which is a sense of profound confidence in the meaning and purpose of life. We may call it insight, feeling, imagination, sympathy, trust; we may call it belief in God, the reconciliation of the human and divine, the mystic union, the Eternal Life. Names do not greatly matter; none of them can suffice; the reality is deeper than all words, and no philosophic theory has ever expressed it—no theological creed has ever defined it. It is a sense of relation to the inner life or spirit of the whole, which takes away all fear and all distrust, which saves us from being offended or dismayed at the confusion and deformity that so often meet our sight; it is an emotional realisation of our own unity with the inner purpose of things, and of the harmony of all other creatures in that purpose; it is the peace of Life itself, inspired by Love—not a Nirvana, bereft of passion and estranged from joy, but the repose of intense feeling and profound resolve."

But are not we meant to be offended and dismayed at the confusion and deformity, which meet our sight? Do we not so realise the Divine purpose that we should fight against these things, and every form of evil, and so overcome and achieve a more perfect life?

There is the one purpose of unchanging good, and we cannot think that it is of little consequence how we think of this, or by what name we speak of the Eternal. We might be moved to question also the last pages of this chapter if it were not for its concluding words (p. 174). It is the living God, who is all in all, in whom we live and move and have our being. With Him, in the doing of His will, who is eternal Righteousness and Love, we find the answer to all our questions, the guidance which alone can lead us in the true way of life.

ANOTHER HASTINGS DICTIONARY.*

ONLY two years ago Dr. Hastings brought out the extra volume of his "Dictionary of the Bible," being the fifth volume of that most admirable work, the first of which appeared in 1898. It is surely a signal proof of his genius as editor, and of a systematic and most strenuous diligence that we now have the first volume of an entirely new dictionary, again a substantial volume of over 900 double-column pages, with promise of a second volume to complete the work, while rumour of yet another dictionary in preparation has already reached us:

The present work is to be regarded as complementary to the "Dictionary of the Bible," and it is designed especially for preachers. Its aim is to give an account of everything that relates to Christ, his person, life, work, and teaching. In the preface we are told:—

"It is called a 'Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels,' because it includes everything that the Gospels contain, whether directly related to Christ or not. Its range, however, is far greater than that of the Gospels. It seeks to cover all that relates to Christ throughout the Bible and in the life and literature of the world. There are articles on the Patristic estimate of Jesus, the mediæval estimate, the Reformation and modern estimates. There are articles on Christ in the Jewish writings and in the Muslim literature. Much attention has been given to modern thought, whether Christian or anti-Christian: Every aspect of modern life, in so far as it touches or is touched by Christ, is described under its proper title. Still the Gospels are the main source of our knowledge of Christ, and it will be found that the contents of the Gospels, specially their spiritual contents, have never before been so thoroughly investigated and set forth."

In this first brief notice we can only offer a word of cordial welcome, and note the rich promise of interest which this volume contains. Among the best-known contributors we note Professor Adeney, who contributes an article of fourteen columns on the Apocrypha, and Professor Johannes Weiss, of Marburg, who writes on the Ethics of Jesus or the Gospels; Dr. Marcus Dodds, who writes on Inspiration, and the Rev. W. R. Inge on the Contents of the "Gospel of John." The article on "Christ in Art" is by the Rev. Percy Dearmer; that on the name Christian by Dr. James Moffat. Prof. Sanday, and Prof. A. S. Peake are also here. We note with special interest that to this volume the Rev. Edgar Daplyn contributes articles on "Appreciation of Christ," "Beloved," "Deliverance," "Good," "Goodness," and "Gift." The first of these articles is the most elaborate, filling two columns and a half. We quote the opening and concluding sentences: "The whole New Testament is one long appreciation of Christ." "This many-sided appreciation of our Lord in his own day, in addition to its obvious gain to the Christian preacher, is suggestive of the many differing points of view from which men may reverently regard Christ, each one expressive of a truth, though not the entirety of the truth. And it may also indicate the many successive ways of wonder, repentance, sympathy, and vision in which Christ speaks to each individual soul."

THE books, large and small, which we have grouped together for brief notice here, are witnesses to the wide-spread interest in the comparative study of religions. Mr. Jordan's elaborate work, which is first on our list, is specially noteworthy as furnishing a handbook, which attempts to cover the whole field of study of comparative religion. For many years the author has been devoted to the study, and the book arose out of a course of special lectures on the rise and development of the science given in the University of Chicago. It will be found of great interest and value, if only for the survey of the literature of the subject prefixed to each chapter, and the account of the workers in this field in many lands. The chapter on the Prophets and Pioneers of the science traces the matter down from the Gnostics to Max Müller; and then follows an interesting account of the chief workers in Great Britain, Holland, France, Belgium, and other lands: Under America due honour is done to the late James Freeman Clarke, of whom it sounds strange to read as Professor Clarke; but it seems that he was at one time professor of Natural Religions and Christian Doctrine at Harvard. More than 100 pages are devoted to appendices on very various subjects, including Babel and Bibel, the German Emperor's famous letter to Admiral Hollmann, the Max Müller Memorial Fund, Mr. Andrew Lang's contributions to anthropology, several lists of lectures such as the Baird, Hibbert, and Gifford, and finally a note on the Chicago "Parliament of Religions" idea:

Mr. Farnell's scholarly work is also the result of lectures, which were delivered under the Hibbert Trust in Manchester College, Oxford, in the spring of 1905. The first two lectures are on the method and problems of the comparative study of religions; the other two lectures take up special subjects for illustration, i.e., The Ritual of Purification and the Evolution of Prayer.

The two little Temple Primers would have been impossible a generation ago. Mr. Macculloch's book, indeed, excludes Judaism and Christianity from his survey, because it was thought advisable to limit it to "an account of the so-called Pagan religions," but the Primer on Sacred Literature includes that of the Hebrews and of Christianity with the rest:

The "Wisdom of the East" series, edited by Mr. Cranmer-Byng and Dr. Kapadia, of which we note one of the recent numbers, is now published, it will be seen, by Mr. Murray. It is a series attractively issued, for the most part of shilling books. Messrs. Constable's series of "Religions Ancient and Modern" is also of great interest and value.

BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY.*

THE four books here mentioned together are a striking testimony to the great work that is being done in the University of Berlin for the modern interpretation of Christianity and its early history. They illustrate at the same time a most welcome new departure among the leading German scholars, in the attempt to popularise the results of their scientific labours, and bring them within the reach of thoughtful non-academic people. The second and third of these books represent courses of popular lectures given in the University after the manner of Harnack's famous course on "What is Christianity?"

1887, a largely extended elaboration of his Hibbert Lectures of 1885, is now to be given to English readers, translated from the second revised and still further enlarged edition of 1902. It will occupy three volumes of the Theological Translation Library, of which we now have the first, which deals with the personality and teaching of the Apostle Paul. At the same time a cordial welcome must be given to Professor Pfeiderer's course of popular lectures on "Christian Origins," for the critical basis of which he refers to the larger work. The book is divided into two main sections, "Preparation and Foundation of Christianity," including chapters on Jesus and the Messianic Congregation; and, secondly, "The Evolution of Early Christianity into the Church." The first chapter of Book I. on "Preparation of Christianity in Greek Philosophy" (which surely should be "preparation for Christianity") was further elaborated by Professor Pfeiderer in an admirable little manual with that title in the series of Religions-geschichtliche Volksbücher, to which we have more than once called attention.

Professor von Soden has published two most interesting and valuable Vacation courses of lectures, one on the most important "Questions in the Life of Jesus" (1904), the other on the "History of Early Christian Literature," which many readers will be glad to welcome in the translation now issued in the Crown Theological Library. The lectures will be found very helpful as an introduction to the thoughtful reading of the New Testament. Of Professor von Soden's manner we will give a sample in these sentences from the section on the Fourth Gospel, which he holds to have been written by a devoted friend of the "beloved disciple."

"There is scarcely a single book in the literature of the world which leaves upon us an impression so difficult to describe as this the most notable creation of the Johannine school. The book is not a homogeneous whole, and yet it is harmonious. It is a perfect web of enigma, and yet the web is lost in the dazzling light which breaks through it. As we read we are in another world, the world of miracle. . . : The book affects our imagination like a transparent symbol of precious eternal truths."

Professor Harnack's elaborate work on "The Expansion of Christianity" is of different scope from the others, but their natural sequel. It is a book for scholars, and full of fascination in its appeal to the historical imagination. The English translation is completed in this second volume in the Theological Translation Library.

A STOPFORD BROOKE BOOK.*

TWENTY years ago, under the title "Sunshine and Shadow," a beautiful book was published of "Meditations from the Writings of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., arranged for daily use," the selections being taken chiefly from his published volumes or from the sermons printed for private circulation during Mr. Brooke's ministry at Bedford Chapel. Now we have a new book, also of selected passages from sermons, but somewhat longer, and arranged not for daily use throughout a year, but according to subjects. Nor are the passages taken from published volumes, but only from sermons in manuscript or hitherto only privately printed.

"There is a reason,"²² says the editor of this volume, "S. J. R.," "why someone other than Mr. Brooke should write a few words, if only to say that he is not responsible, either for the idea, the scheme, or the title of a volume which the great company of people of all classes who had been helped by his interpretation of life and religion, inspired in the personal quest of the chief good, and moved to practical action in the direction of civic righteousness, are sure to prize. When the idea of this little book was placed before Mr. Brooke he expressed his own misgivings, and only yielded when he was persuaded that for such a work there was a strong desire on the part of many—widely scattered to-day—whose souls had been stirred and uplifted during the eighteen years when Bedford Chapel, Bloomsbury, was in truth a quiet sanctuary where those who were weary, perplexed, and sometimes baffled renewed their strength, and found once more the secret of courage."

We cannot think that the editor has been fortunate in his title for this volume or the publisher in his binding, nor is the portrait from one of Mr. Hollyer's photographs particularly happy, but for the rest the book is, as it could not fail to be, a most welcome addition to our store of Mr. Brooke's inspiring words. One other mistake the editor has made, and that is to allow a volume from the sermons of our preacher of the Gospel of Joy to end with a passage on "The Minor Key in Life." It was probably put in merely to fill up the last page, but a stronger ending would have been better.

The selections are classed under the following headings: "Religion and Conduct: Lessons by the Way. Social Problems: The Outlook—Here and Hereafter. The Foundations of Life: The City of the Soul." There is here the old buoyancy of faith, the poet's delight in Nature and all things of beauty, clear vision of spiritual truth, and at the same time the passion for justice and social reform with which we have long been familiar. We must not linger now over any special passages, but to anyone who should come for the first time to Mr. Brooke's teaching in this volume we should say, Look at the passage on page 24 on "Self-interest of the Wealthy," and another on page 166 on "The Race set before Us," for two of the preacher's most distinctive notes. And let young preachers especially ponder the passage on page 64 on "The Foundation of Teaching." But, of course, read the whole book and keep it. And give another copy to a friend!

BLESSED is the man who has the gift of making friends; for it is one of God's best gifts. It involves many things; but, above all, the power of going out of one's self, and seeing and appreciating whatever is noble and loving in another man.—Thomas Hughes.

SUGGESTIONS ON RESTATEMENT: IV.—THE PROBLEM OF EVIL.

If any system of Theism feels the existence of evil to be an upsetting fact, it is because the system is not thoroughly moralised, and has for its motive mainly intellectualist presuppositions. A Theism that is a genuine outcome of moral and religious experience might be expected to find in the existence of evil, not a formidable difficulty, but a confirmation, fetched from alien ground, of its own truth. What are the primary facts of experience which are immediately relevant to our question? Not the demand for a scientific explanation of causal relationships; not the philosophical demand for the deepest ground of reality. Religion, it is true, has a lien over both these territories, but they only become religious in so far as they are interpreted in the sense of moral requirement. The primary facts are that the soul finds its truest life in goodness; goodness is illuminating, and makes the world intensely worth having; the soul is defeated and depressed when it turns to evil. Then the implicit logic of the moral life draws its conclusion—that our individuality with its goodness is in some way derivative from a supreme spiritual reality to which whatever in us is most real must be referred. This Supreme is thought of as Goodness Itself, Goodness alive and ruling. The "motive" for postulating the existence of God is to fix and embody in the only possible way these primary facts: God is felt to be the ground of all that ought to be in our life; all spirits seeking the good are ipso facto yielding to His persuasion.

If these deliverances of the moral experience stood alone, the problem of evil would not arise. There are, however, a number of other "motives"; and these, briefly, issue in a demand of the intellect that God shall be shown as in some way the Ground and original explanation of all existence and becoming. How can anything exist outside of His sphere, alien to His governed world? Is not evil, also, in His design? This is obviously the path by which, e.g., in a passage than which there can surely be nothing more poignant and moving in modern religious writing, Mr. Wicksteed comes to the conclusion that God creates evil.* I believe that the "motive" here is right; but the desperate result can and must be avoided.

Whereas the intellectualist motive seems to require that all facts and events should be tied up and co-ordinated on some one necessary principle such as causation, the moral life posits necessities of quite a different order: God is not, for it, a natural Force that manifests itself by differentiating or bifurcating itself into good and evil, to which therefore all events must be traced back as to the one cause: He is the Living Goodness to which men refer their own aspirations after goodness. There are, then, two "necessities" relevant to the question: (1) Good must conquer and evil fights a losing battle: (2) Goodness implies the possibility (though not the existence) of evil. These necessities constitute for the moral sense the original or foundation character of God's relation to the world of spirits. Its formula is that God is adequate to the world: (1)

* "The Life Superlative." By Stopford A. Brooke, (Pitman & Sons, 6s.)

* Studies in Theology, pp. 100-1

To meet its emergencies; (2) To explain its facts: Thus the moral sense re-interprets the intellectualist demand. It knows nothing of mechanical cause; but it stands in awe before a tremendous implication of the existence of Goodness. Because God is Goodness itself, He implies, simply by the fact of His existence, the possibility of evil. This possibility is indeed only another aspect of the fact that He is: Cut off this possibility, and He cannot be even in the abstract. The whole of His victorious existence in the world of fact, also, is bound up with it. It would, of course, be a misuse of language to pretend that the words "God creates evil" mean just this. But it appears that our statement is what those words aim at, if rightly interpreted. Even with regard to evil, the fact of God is the conditioning, formative fact. Look into the heart of Goodness itself, and you see a fact, not terrible but solemn, not painful but profound:—That evil is—not a necessary existence, but—necessarily a possibility.

And this is all the necessity that any system ought to assert as between God and evil. No amount of argument from causation will ever avail to overwhelm the clear dictate of the moral self, that Goodness does not and cannot create Evil. If it is objected that this is to leave Evil hanging uncaused, the reply is that Evil (like Good) is not caused, but chosen. To ask for the cause of a choice, i.e., a volition, is a flagrant example of cart before horse; for we get our idea of cause from that of volition, so that we cannot find an explanation of volition in cause. Therefore, our ultimate explanation must be in terms of moral experience itself, and cannot be brought in ab extra. But once it has been seen, as above, what measure and kind of Authorship and Origination is demanded for God by the moral need, the task of rendering this in intellectualist terms is not insurmountable. On an idealist system, e.g., for which reality is ultimately a world of spirits, God is the ground and source and Living Goodness who expresses the fact of the possibility of evil in the shape of the free will of spirits. This is the speech, it is true, of picture thinking, but there is no valid objection to it if we will remember that the picture is thus framed to show the absoluteness of God as Living Goodness. To object: "Why did not God make spirits good without possibility of evil?" is to attempt illegitimately to go behind the meaning of "Goodness." Also, the picture is defective because it does not show God as working all along in the spirits for good. He might be supposed to have left them to themselves after making them free. Some sort of victory of the Good, however, is always implied. For, finally, our view finds its chief justification in that it lies genuinely along the line of the Christian solution. The world as we know it is a redemptive process. The failure to emphasise this was the weakness of the Leibnitzian and other Deistic theodicies.

OBITUARY.

MR. S. D. HALL.

THE congregation of Friargate Chapel, Derby, are mourning the loss of a devoted member, Mr. Samuel D. Hall, who passed away after a brief illness, on Thursday, December 6, at the age of 55. Warden of the chapel and president of the Sunday-school, a lay preacher of exceptional ability, a man of great activity and heartiest good will, held in warm affection and high honour for his stainless character, his loss is keenly felt, but he has left with his friends a very precious and quickening memory. Mr. Hall was a native of Derby, his uncle, Mr. Spencer Hall, being known as a writer on Derbyshire. As a lad he was apprenticed in the lithographic department of Messrs. Bemrose & Sons, and became head foreman of that department, in which he took the keenest interest. He was one of the early lecturers on lithography appointed by the London City and Guilds Institute. In what estimation he was held was shown at the funeral on Monday, when Friargate Chapel was filled with mourners, among whom were a large number of the men who had worked under his inspiring and brotherly direction. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland. The grave at the Nottingham-road Cemetery was covered with beautiful flowers.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHRISTMAS brings to us every year many thoughts of happiness, and among them always the thought of Jesus as a little child, and as a boy growing up to manhood.

We think of him with the other children, playing their games, perhaps out in the road or on the hillside, watching the habits of the birds, of the goats and other animals, delighting in the flowers and all beautiful things in the open country; and then in school with the rest, learning to read, and learning many beautiful sentences by heart out of the ancient Scriptures of his people, which we have now in our Bible, in what is called the Old Testament.

We know what he afterwards taught the people himself, and I want to put together here some of the sentences from the old Scriptures, which he may very likely have learnt by heart when he was a boy—and which he certainly often thought of very earnestly when he was growing up to be a man; and then after these some of the words of his own teaching, so that you may see how they belong together, and how his life was just the perfecting of the teaching of his people, making it more strong and beautiful, that it might help us all.

I shall put the references to show where the verses come from, so that you can look for them in your Bibles if you like.

And first from the Old Testament some of the words which the boy Jesus may have learnt by heart:—

"This commandment which I command thee this day, it is not too hard for thee; neither is it far off. . . . The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it: See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, and to walk in his ways and to keep his commandments."—Deut. xxx. 11, 14, 15.

"What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"—Micah vi. 8.

"The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children; to such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his precepts to do them."—Ps. ciii. 17, 18.

"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want: He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters: He restoreth my soul: He guideth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me: Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."—Ps. xxiii. 1-4, 6.

And then these verses from the teaching of Jesus himself:—

"Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled:

"Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.

"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.

"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called sons of God."—Matt. v. 6-9.

"Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."—Matt. vii. 21.

To the question "What commandment is the first of all?" Jesus answered, The first is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God, the Lord is one: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The second is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these."—Mark xiii. 29, 30.

Think how much meaning there is in those words, and how it must make us strong and glad if we live as we are bidden by them to live:

THE Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed is to lecture on "The Social Question" at the Acton Unitarian Church in Creffield-road, at 8.15, on Monday evening next.

IN the Honours lists of the recent B.A. examination in the University of London Miss Dorothy Tarrant, of Girton College, Cambridge, daughter of our friend the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, is in the first class for classes, and, in fact, is alone in that high honour. In the second class, in the list of external students, there are five women and only three men. None of the internal students obtained a first class. Honour where honour is due, and heartiest congratulations!

WHO IS A CHRISTIAN?

IN the following "Musing by a Minister" it will be seen that a thesis is stated as to who may in strictness be called a Christian. Reasons are given for its acceptance, as it would seem, unwilling reasons, by one who would be glad to hold a different view. As, owing to the crowd of other things pressing before it into our columns, this article has been for some time in type, we took the opportunity of asking Dr. DRUMMOND and Mr. POYNTING to be good enough to make the contributions to a discussion of the subject, which follow the "Musing"; and for the same reason, we are able to add a note in response by the original writer.

For our own part, we may be allowed to say that we follow Dr. DRUMMOND's argument with complete assent, and feel that a thesis involving the exclusion of the Society of Friends from the fellowship of "historical Christianity" is by that very fact self-condemned. Christianity, though it may never have been formally reconstituted, has, we believe, certainly outgrown the limits of any one "institution," and any ecclesiastical basis, on which it may be supposed to have been founded. It is rightly regarded as a spirit of life, which has been embodied in many forms, and may well take other forms to meet the growing needs of the world. What must remain constant is, in our view, the sincere profession of discipleship, and self-dedication to the service, not necessarily of the church, but certainly of the Kingdom of God.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XLIX.

I CONFESS to some sympathy with those who hold that he only is a "Christian" who is a baptized member of some recognised, visible Communion of the Christian Church. I say this because I have regard for the plain historic sense of a word, whatever it may be. Hooker stoutly maintained, in his day, that a "priest" who does not sacrifice is not a priest—for neither Jew nor heathen ever thought of a priest that did not sacrifice—and Ruskin as strongly asserted that "priest," as a contraction for "presbyter," is "a vulgar equivocation." The argument, I feel, would hold good in respect of the word "Christian." It was used in the beginning to denote the professed followers of Jesus of Nazareth as the Jewish Messiah. It was then accepted by these followers as the name by which they, and those who were duly admitted into their body, were content to be known. But in both cases—as name, or nickname—it was an appellation only. The term is now made to connote certain moral qualities, but it is difficult to see what support can be found for this secondary use. In other words, the Christian name has always been, historically and legally, a title of profession, and has never been a certificate of character. How, indeed, could it be? The Christian Church, like any other body, has the right to define itself, and to impose its terms of incorporation, but inner motive and intention, as they cannot be tested, cannot be certified. An act of incorporation is all that any society can propose, and an act of profession is all that it can require. The only act of incorporation known to Christendom is the rite of baptism; the Greek, Latin, Lutheran, and Anglican Communions are here agreed; baptism has always been accompanied by profession; and the Christian name, as a sign of recognised membership, has invariably been used to distinguish acknowledged Christians from unacknowledged non-Christians.

Are we not a little misled in this matter by the confusion of quality and qualification, and by the fallacy of supposing that one involves the other? We forget that a man may be Christ-like, and yet not a Christian; or be a Christian, and yet not Christ-like. That the term "Christian," as a name or token, connects itself with profession, and not with character, is shown by the fact that we may think of a Jew, or a Turk, as Christ-like, but we dare not call him Christian. The latter term would be regarded as an insult, and might even be treated as libellous, by an incensed Jew or Mahomedan.

It will be said, perhaps, that a formality ought not to determine whether we are within or without the Christian pale. But, in the first place, Christianity knows nothing of formalities—a sacrament, according to orthodox belief, being an actual means or channel for the conveyance of grace—and, in the second place, even formalities, as a matter of fact, have a very positive value in determining status. We all have a common duty to our country, but the soldier who has taken the King's shilling is not in the same case with the civilian who has not. By that simple act he stands pledged to particular service, and subjects himself to peculiar penalties. The civilian may have all the essential qualities of the soldier, but, unenlisted, escapes his professional responsibilities.

If it be urged that presumed discipleship ought to be enough, the question at once arises, What is discipleship? Where does it begin, and how far does it go?

May I be a disciple of Jesus Christ in the sense, and to the extent, in which I am a disciple, say, of Tolstoy? There is no tie so easily made, and so easily unmade, as the tie between teacher and learner. To what does the mere disciple pledge himself? He is absolutely unpledged, uncommitted. Therefore historic Christianity knows nothing of discipleship apart from baptism, with its specific profession.

If, however, the ante-ecclesiastical discipleship of the Gospels be taken as the model, let us see what that discipleship involved. Disciples were to have love, one to another; to continue in the Master's word; to hate their own lives; to renounce all that they had. By these signs would all men know that they were disciples indeed. If anyone is minded to substitute these original conditions for those of later baptismal profession, let him do so, but let him not think that the primitive disciple made no formal declaration, or was excused from outward test and proof.

I am obliged, then, theoretically, to respect the orthodox position, for I cannot easily believe that the Christian name is the only title which can be assumed without precise act and deed, and statement of purpose and assent. It is, of course, possible that Christianity may some day be re-constituted on a non-ecclesiastical basis, but by its present constitution it presupposes a covenant, and it is of the very nature of covenant that to definite terms there should be definite and avowed agreement. If any one will argue me out of reluctant sympathy with this position, he will do me no slight service.

REFLECTIONS ON THE NAME "CHRISTIAN."

As one who was himself baptized, and who fully approves of baptism as the ancient and almost universally accepted means of incorporating new members in the Christian Church, I may seem ill qualified to remove the scruple expressed in the foregoing "Musing." But, since I do not regard baptism as essential, and would not, on the sole ground of deficiency in that respect, refuse the Christian name to anyone who claimed it, perhaps I can suggest one or two considerations that may, at least to some extent, relieve the difficulty.

In the first place, the transition from "qualification" to "quality" is a very natural one. Christianity from the first implied a certain kind of spiritual character; and though there have been most unworthy members of the Church, nevertheless, when we speak of a man as truly Christian, I think everyone would understand that, in addition to his profession, he approached the spiritual ideal which Christianity inculcates. St. Paul is very explicit on this point. He never, indeed, uses the word "Christian"; but both positively and negatively he lays down a principle which is applicable in the present question. He says: "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God," and "If a man have not the spirit of Christ, he is not his." Nothing can be more universal, and nothing can more distinctly give the primacy to spiritual quality. St. Paul also sets the example of extending the use of a term: A Jew was properly a member of a particular nation bound by a special sign of a covenant with God; and yet Paul says, "He is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter." So, I think, baptism may be in the spirit, not in the letter; and the true baptism is the bathing of the heart in the spirit of Christ. In accordance with this principle, Paul boldly represents all the disciples of Christ as children of Abraham, and describes them as "the Israel of God"—certainly a great departure from historical usage, but one which I should not like to call "a vulgar equivocation."

This larger view was not wholly lost even in the second century. The word "Christian" is used in both a wider and a narrower sense by so stiff and orthodox a man as Justin Martyr. He says that those who lived with reason (logos) were Christians, as, among the Greeks, Socrates and Heraclitus (Apol. I. 46); but he also warns Tryphon not to regard as Christians those who say that there is no resurrection of the dead, but that souls are taken up into heaven at the time of death; and he adds that he, and all who were in every respect orthodox Christians, knew that there would be a resurrection of the flesh and a thousand years in Jerusalem (Dial. 80). The complete passing away of these millennial doctrines shows that Christianity has something deeper than dogma, and that the right of the Church to impose its own conditions is not without limits.

It cannot, however, be denied that in strictness the name of "Christian" implies some sort of profession, and it could be only in a very loose sense that, following the example of Justin Martyr, we could call a Jew or a Turk, Christian. If we did so, we should simply intend to indicate that he possessed in an eminent degree the virtues which we think proper to a Christian. To me, in my private thought, everyone is a Christian whom I think Jesus Christ would accept as one of his spiritual brethren; and his rule is very wide: "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother." But, while this is a loose use of the word, may we not properly address as Christian all who in sincerity "profess and call themselves Christians"? Their doing so implies the consciousness of some kind of loyal connection with the great historical movement known as Christianity; and there is no other accepted word by which to describe them. If a man, after all deductions of criticism and rejection of seeming errors and neglect of observances, nevertheless feels that the New Testament, interpreted in a large sense, has been the standard of his religious thought and the formative power of his character, and if he is conscious of standing in a spiritual relation towards Jesus Christ that he does not hold towards any other man, what can we call him but a Christian? He may be heretical or schismatic, or even very imperfect in character, but still Christian. The precise nature of the discipleship it is not necessary to define; and we may be content to say, with Paul, "Grace be with all them that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

I gravely doubt whether "the Christian Church, like any other body, has the right . . . to impose its terms of incorporation." I have a higher idea of the Church. It is not a self-constituted club; but, as a Divine institution, and claiming to be "the Church of God," it is subject to Divine conditions. Each sect, may, of course, seek to define these conditions, so far as is needful for corporate action, and has a right to exclude from its communion those who do not conform to the conditions. But it does not follow that it can thereby exclude people from the Church of God; and if the exclusion is based upon conditions which are not Divine, the departure from the Christian ideal lies with the sect, and not with those who are excluded. To break up the corporate unity of the Church is a serious thing, which only an extreme emergency can justify, and to separate oneself from it through mere self-will and presumption is a grievous fault. But if men are solemnly convinced that the Church is imposing conditions of membership which Christ would not sanction, and which they themselves cannot conscientiously accept, they may be mistaken, but as honourable disciples of Christ they have no choice; and it is hard to see that they cease to be Christian in making a great sacrifice in order that they may be more deeply imbued with the spirit of Christ. I care little for a name except for its historical and religious associations; but I think that the refusal of the name to such men involves a most damaging misrepresentation of their position.

I do not know whether these remarks will prove helpful. At all events they are written in no controversial spirit, but with deep respect towards the Minister whose "Musings" have always greatly interested me.

JAMES DRUMMOND.

Upon the question raised by a Minister in XLIX. of his Musings depends the whole difference between Catholic and Protestant theology. Does my being a "Christian" depend upon something done by my parents and a duly ordained priest on my behalf, or upon a personal affection of my own heart? To be a Christian means either the one thing or the other, but not both. The definition, therefore, of a Christian as "a baptized member of some recognised visible communion of the Christian Church" is one that has never been valid. Either one must be a baptized member of the one recognised visible communion of the Catholic Church; or else, if personal loyalty is the one essential thing, then my membership is in that invisible Church of all whom Christ recognises to be his. No Christian community which claims that this personal loyalty is the one essential has ever deemed baptism to be indispensable. Are the members of the Society of Friends excluded from the Christian community? Did John Wesley demand that those who professed "conversion" must be baptized before being received into fellowship? Or does the Salvation Army to-day preach the doctrine of the Sacraments? For the Catholic, the Christian is he who has been duly baptized; for the Protestant, it is the one who professes and calls himself Christian. There is no middle term.

C. T. POYNTING.

A NOTE IN RESPONSE:

FRIENDLY opponents have honoured me with two replies. With the first I could entirely agree, if Christianity were only a spiritual conception, or a school of thought, and not a working institution compelled, for its own preservation, to explain itself by definition, and to protect itself by discipline.

The second, if I may say it, is not very convincing. There is no received system of doctrine known as "Protestant theology." Local "Confessions" have from time to time been put forth, but that is all. What support do they give to the plea that by calling himself Christian a man constitutes himself a member of the Christian Society? And what relevant conclusion can be drawn from the mere fact that Quakers and Salvationists depart from Christian usage, and do so with impunity? Because the latter have assumed military titles without incurring any penalty, are they also to rank as commissioned officers?

A MINISTER.

THERE is one grand, all-comprehending church; and if I am a Christian I belong to it, and no man can shut me out of it. You may exclude me from your Roman church, your Episcopal church, and your Calvinistic church, on account of supposed defects in my creed or my sect, and I am content to be excluded. But I will not be severed from the great body of Christ. Who shall sunder me from such men as Fénelon, and Pascal, and Borromeo, from Archbishop Leighton, Jeremy Taylor, and John Howard? Who can rupture the spiritual bond between these men and myself? Do I not hold them dear? Does not their spirit, flowing out through their writings and lives, penetrate my soul? Are they not a portion of my being? Am I not a different man from what I should have been, had not these and other like spirits acted on mine? And is it in the power of synod, or conclave, or of all the ecclesiastical combinations on earth, to part me from them? I am bound to them by thought and affection; and can these be suppressed by the bull of a pope or the excommunication of a council? The soul breaks scornfully these barriers, these webs of spiders, and joins itself to the great and good; and if it possess their spirit, will the great and good, living or dead, cast it off because it has not enrolled itself in this or another sect? A pure mind is free of the universe. It belongs to the church, the family of the pure, in all worlds. Virtue is no local thing. It is not honourable because born in this community or that, but for its own independent, everlasting beauty. This is the bond of the universal church. No man can be excommunicated from it but by himself, by the death of goodness in his own breast. All sentences of exclusion are vain, if he do not dissolve the tie of purity which binds him to all holy souls.—Channing.

ADVENT ADDRESSES.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

IV.—THE JEW.

"I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.—Rom. i. 16.

In previous sermons I have spoken of the relationship of Christianity respectively to the Greek, the Roman, and the Barbarian. It was an advent to each, a gospel, a message of glad news that affected and superseded the faith of each, and was in its turn affected by the faith of each. Greek philosophy needed the steadiness and strength of Christianity, its emphasis on conscience, and its secret of self-sacrifice. But, on its side, it gave to the Gospel a rational basis, moulded its doctrines into a system, and developed its creeds. Greece also enriched the church with its art and symbolism. In the same way, Roman Stoicism lacked the lowliness, the gentleness, the democratic sympathies, and the joyfulness of Christianity; but the Roman sense of order provided the Church with its organisation and imperial ideals. The Church gained by its transference to Greek soil; it gained still more, as a world power, by its union with the Roman State. Again, the popular Barbarian religion throughout Europe yielded to the preaching of the Christian missionaries. Its superstitions, its crude ideas of retribution and deity, were displaced by the monotheism, the morality, the spiritual inwardness, and the charity of the Gospel. Pagan childishness was transformed into Christian modesty and grace, and produced some of the finest fruits of character. At the same time, paganism told on the services and festivals of the Church. The mysteries of the sacraments were to a large extent derived from the magic and sorcery of heathendom.

My object to-day is to show a similar interdependence between Christianity and Judaism. The Gospel was an advent to the Jews; it passed outside the limits of the Jewish communion, it swiftly outstripped it as a missionary power, left it alone as a small, select, and mainly national religious body, while it grew into a vast cosmopolitan soul-saving society. Yet Christianity had its origin among the Jews, was nurtured on the religion of the Jews, and when it departed from Judaism, took with it the Bible, the Church idea, the public worship, the belief and the piety of the Jews.

Christianity, of course, owed more to Judaism, was more intimately associated with it, than with any other form of faith. Jesus himself, I need hardly say, was a Jew; He was taught by Jewish masters, was fed on the Jewish scriptures. He preached to Jews, sought first, as he said, the salvation of "the lost sheep of Israel." And his teaching was largely made up of Jewish doctrines; of truths, at any rate, frequently to be met with in the Psalms and the books of the Prophets. It was his custom to worship in the synagogue, and he made it his practice, apparently, to support what he said to the people by quotations from the Old Testament. His originality, to a considerable degree, was one of emphasis, one of renewal, and re-interpretation of the old. He was careful not to break away sharply from the past.

He was like his own householder, who brought forth from his treasure things old and new. He probably did not realise that his Gospel would be other than a form of Judaism. His disciples, who were all Jews, were apparently content, until St. Paul joined them, that Christianity should remain a division of the Jewish Church. And St. Paul, when he took the Gospel beyond the boundaries of Palestine, declared that it was a message to the Jew first and afterwards to the Gentile. He began his work almost invariably in the synagogue, believing that the Jews, by nature and education, were the best fitted to understand and embrace the truth of Christ.

"By nature and education"; because, firstly, they had, above all peoples, a genius for religion and righteousness; and secondly, they had a book of religion and an institution for the cultivation of religion of a far loftier character than any other.

As the Greeks were endowed with a sense of the reasonable and the beautiful, and the Romans with a sense of order and discipline, the Jews, as a people, were inspired with a sense of holiness. These are sweeping statements, to which, no doubt, many exceptions may be found; but they are in the main true. The Greek at his best was an artist and a philosopher; the Roman a grave master of himself and of weaker men; the Jew a prophet of righteousness. The ideal of Greece was one of intelligence and refinement, of Rome one of self-control and government, of Israel one of purity and godliness. Throughout Greek literature the protest is against ignorance, ugliness, unreasonableness, bad taste; in Roman letters the evil constantly reprobated is unruliness, disobedience, foolish and fanatical violence; in the Bible the continual outcry is against sin. Here is the fundamental distinction which must set Israel always at the head of the peoples of antiquity: The Hebrew stands for conscience. He was the real discoverer of conscience. He was the first to unfold the divine contents of conscience. And his Bible—the Old Testament—is before all books (except the Christian Scriptures) the text-book of conscience.

No doubt the Hebrew was at one time little better than others. There are traces in the Old Testament of a dark and brutal paganism; but there are traces also of this element of conscience in the most ancient records. Take, for example, one of the oldest and most heathen of Hebrew poems, the "Song of Deborah." There we hear, among fierce cries of bloodthirsty vengeance, an appeal to "the righteousness of the Lord." Already God is associated with justice: He is seen and known through the conscience. One of the most ancient names of the Hebrew people is "Jeshurun," which means the "Upright"; and Israel itself denotes the "Wrestler with God"—he who has known "the contention and strain that it costs to stand upright." The first Hebrew who comes to Zion, according to the old tradition, is Melchizedek, or "the righteous king." Jerusalem—a word apparently coined by the Hebrew conquerors of the previous Cananite fortress, signifies the abode of peace, which is the inheritance, all through Hebrew literature, of those who follow after righteousness: The Old Testament is full of sayings such as these: "Righteousness tendeth to life," "He that pursueth evil, pursueth it to his own death," "the way of transgressors is hard," "he that keepeth judgment, happy is he: its ways are ways of pleasantness, and all its paths are peace." Matthew Arnold says: "No people ever felt so strongly as the Hebrew people that conduct is three-fourths of our life and its largest concern. No people ever felt so strongly that succeeding, going right, hitting the mark in this great concern was the way of peace, the highest possible satisfaction."

While, therefore, we go to the Greek for statuary and architecture and metaphysics, and to the Roman for law and government, we go to the Hebrew for the weightier matter of national and personal righteousness. The Old Testament is, of course, very far from being always righteous; but its best portions reveal a marvellous insight into the nature of sin and penitence, forgiveness and reconciliation, and all the problems of the spiritual life. Indeed, passing from the Roman and Greek writings to the Hebrew Scriptures, it is hardly too much to say that we come upon a new vocabulary, a whole family of words and phrases which take their meaning from conscience, and disclose to us a profounder mental world. This is the glory of the Hebrew. He has taught mankind the infinite distinction between right and wrong. He has proclaimed, as no one else has done, that God is just and against the wicked. He has practically opened the eyes of humanity to the truth that the wages of sin is death, and the wages of righteousness is life. Further, as a result of this trust in righteousness, the Jews were the most hopeful people of antiquity. They looked forward. Their golden age was in front of them, not behind. The kingdom of God would come. In their darkest days the Hebrews believed that their justification was sure: "I know," Israel declared, "that my Redeemer liveth." Nothing could destroy this conviction: It was indomitable, inextinguishable. Defeated, exiled, dispersed, persecuted, tormented, the Hebrew still was certain that God would one day rescue him and set him, and his cause, high among the peoples of the earth.

Why, then, it may be asked, did not Judaism become a universal faith? And what was there in Christianity which made it that which Judaism failed to be and could not be?

In the first place, the Hebrews were a proud, exclusive race. They were very conscious of their ethical and religious superiority. They thought of themselves too much as the chosen of the Lord. Sometimes, it is true, as in the Book of Isaiah, we meet with a noble liberality, a genuine evangelistic spirit, a desire that the Gentiles may share the blessings enjoyed by Israel. What can be finer than Isaiah's prayer that "the earth may be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea"? But, as a rule, the narrow national spirit predominates, and it glows often with a cruel hatred where we least like to meet with it. In that magnificent 139th psalm, for example, one of the very highest and most exalted utterances of the soul in the Hebrew, or in any literature, there comes a painful note of self-righteousness and exclusion. "How precious are thy thoughts unto me, O God," says the writer; "How great is the sum of them; if I should count them, they are more in number than the sand." He goes on, "When I awake I am still with Thee. . . . Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." But in the midst of this latter beautiful passage come the words, "Surely Thou wilt slay the wicked; . . . Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate Thee? I hate them with a perfect hatred."

The Pharisees at the time of Jesus had inherited this stern, un pitying disposition. They were indeed missionaries, travelling over land and sea to make a proselyte, establishing synagogues in all the principal cities of the Empire. But they were sectaries. They were set on making Jews rather than thoughtful, upright, godly men, keen therefore about points of difference, laying stress on peculiar ceremonies and usages. Hence they persecuted the Baptist and crucified Jesus Christ. They would not tolerate, if they could help it, any teaching but their own.

And, in the second place, these national ecclesiastical features of the Jewish faith were of a kind to seriously impede its progress. Their law was written in a dead language, in the Old Hebrew which none but Jewish scholars could understand. It was very complicated and extensive. Its interpretation was therefore in the hands of a learned caste without any special spiritual qualifications. And among the statutes imposed were atonements, sacrifices, and ceremonies, practically impossible for the majority of the Jews themselves to observe, and of a foreign, forbidding aspect to the Gentile world.

In short, Judaism had not the expansiveness, the adaptability to other men's needs, the sense of proportion; in a word, the sympathy necessary for a world-evangel. Its monotheism, its conscience, its grand hopefulness, were just what the world wanted, but these universal, gospel elements were wrapped up and hidden in a thick covering of racial and priestly prejudice. It presented itself to the Empire as stiff and unbending, incapable of giving and taking; uncompromising, conceited; and it remained for another though kindred religion, a layman's religion, born in poverty and meekness, and nurtured on persecution, to give men the truth they were in need of, and to give it to them in the way in which they were prepared to receive it.

And such was the charity of the Gospel, such was its comprehensiveness, that it succeeded in detaching itself from Judaism without any deep hostility. St. Paul, it is true, said hard things of the law in the midst of the conflict; but the moment Christianity got free from its bondage, it was as open to influence on that side as on any other. The Hebrew Scriptures, the Jewish idea of the Church as an institution for worship and redemption, the Jewish Sabbath (though on a different day in the week), the Jewish liturgies, the Jewish symbol of sacrifice, the customs of fasting and penance, the distinction between clergy and laity, the belief in angels and a future judgment passed into Christianity as naturally as the various features of Greek, Roman, and Barbarian faith, which I have already specified. The Gospel would not have been a universal religion, if it had not laid itself under a deep obligation to Judaism also, and to Judaism most of all.

But there is one feature of Christianity which is peculiarly its own and inseparable from it for all time. We have it before Christ, but it is none the less essentially Christian. Isaiah had conceived the idea of "the suffering servant of the Lord." The true Israel, he had said, was that section of the people of God who were ready to serve and suffer for the rest. I read for our first lesson the beautiful chapter in which the idea is elaborated, a chapter so full of the Christian spirit that it has been taken in uncritical times as a prophecy of Christ himself. But the conception never took root. It had little or no place in the Jewish religion until Jesus, who studied and loved Isaiah's writings, fastened upon it and made it both the starting-point of his preaching, and the central thought of the Gospel. The Messiah, he said, must suffer. He must be poor and despised, of no account in the eyes of the world. The sinful and the sad must be his care—so gentle will he be that the smoking flax he will not quench, the least glimmer of light in a man he will blow softly into a flame. By his righteousness will he be a judge, and by the rod of his mouth—by the weapon of truth—will he punish the wicked. And he will not be disheartened until his new law of love be established, and the contending forces of the earth lie down together in peace. Can we doubt that Jesus cherished this ideal, kept it constantly before him, and shaped his whole life in accordance with it? He was himself the suffering servant. And St. Paul saw in him the true Messiahship. Jesus, he said, was the Christ. But to the Jews this was simply blasphemy. The Messiah they expected was to come in power, with miracles and signs, and outward glory, abolishing the Roman Empire and setting up the Jewish nation at the head of the world. So here Judaism and the Gospel parted company, and St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians: "The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom; but we preach a Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness, but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, the power of God and the wisdom of God."

The two ideals and the contrast between them appear in a remarkable manner in the Book of Revelation. One of the evidences of the catholic spirit shown by the Early Christian Church towards Judaism is the fact that the Christians did not hesitate to make use of and to revise for their own purposes contemporary Jewish writings. Several of such works, of Jewish authorship in the first instance, but reshaped by Christian hands, have come down to us; and the Apocalypse or Book of Revelation is one of them. It was once a purely Jewish document, written in Aramaic or late Hebrew. A Christian turned it into Greek, and enlarged it by the addition of a number of important interpolations. The result is that sometimes Jewish and Christian elements jostle oddly together in the same chapter. An example of this occurs in chapter v., where the Messiah is represented by the Jewish author as a Lion, and by the Christian editor as a Lamb. How could the difference be better expressed? The ideal of the Jew was ascendancy. He desired to see his nation, in virtue of its righteousness, the strong, irresistible lion among the peoples, God's kingly one among the creatures, more powerful even than the Roman eagle. "Weep not," he says to his afflicted and persecuted race, "behold the Lion, which is of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, shall prevail." But the Christian, adapting the passage to the needs of the suffering Church, says that the Lamb shall sit in the throne—that the gentle symbol of self-sacrifice and love and pity and innocence shall be the dominant power of the world—that slowly the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of truth and justice and charity, shall make its way into the highest places, shall permeate the church and the home, the shop and the office, and the council-chamber, driving away whatever is brutal, savage and accursed.

And is this not still the faith of the Christian? belief in the Lamb, the symbol of life, that gives itself for others, the sign which the great Florentine sculptor carved over the door of his famous bell-tower to say to generations of citizens, "By me if any man enter in he shall be saved; and shall go in and out and find pasture"? There are many strong things in life. "Physique," says the Barbarian; "brains," says the Grecian; "organisation," says the Roman; "righteousness," says the Hebrew. But the strongest of all is love—love that thinks little of itself, that suffereth long and is kind, that believeth and hopeth and endureth all things for the brethren. It never fails. Give it time, give it room, and it will find its seat at last in the throne. Yes, the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of self-denial and self-effacement, the spirit which at this season above all others should be and is manifested as "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world."

APOLOGIES to Mr. Richard Robinson for a correction which ought to have been made a fortnight ago and was overlooked. In the report of the birthday presentation to Mr. Steinthal in THE INQUIRER of November 24, we represented Mr. Robinson as saying that he first knew Mr. Steinthal when he was a Mission minister in Liverpool. We thus attributed to Mr. Robinson a venerable age he has still to attain. What he actually said was that when he went to Liverpool, in 1872, he first knew of Mr. Steinthal's missionary work in that city, which belonged to the years 1857-62.

In a busy world, developing to the utmost the mechanical agencies by which its comforts and luxuries may be increased, science may quicken that sense of the Infinite, that solemn awe, that conviction of the unutterable majesty of all created things, which will constitute the very soil in which a rational religious faith can take root and grow.—*H. PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT:

PRECEDENCE must be given in this letter to men rather than to movements. After all, the personal element is the strongest force in all associations. Much as we cry, "not men, but measures," we know that it is the love and confidence which "men" arouse that makes "measures" acceptable. In religious associations this must always be peculiarly so. Men are our living "epistles," "known and read of all men." As the special word is made flesh in them so we learn to love and understand it. In this feeling we have all been joining together to express something of the great love and reverence in which the Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal is held among us. We are not an emotional people here in the North. But sometimes our affections break through our wonted reserve, and then men see how strong and deep they are. Not that there can ever have been any doubt as to the place Mr. Steinthal occupied in our midst. For longer than I can recall he has been our Nestor. When I was a student here he gathered us round his hospitable board on a Sunday evening and showed us what a rare thing the Christian ministry might be made. That was nearly a quarter of a century ago, and yet it was about midway in Mr. Steinthal's Manchester career. For nearly fifty years Mr. Steinthal has been our wise and trusted friend. Nor has he spent himself in the service of the churches merely; rather he has gained inspiration and power there which he has spent liberally in splendid public service. In the work of learned associations he has had an honourable part, as witness the presentation just made to him by the Geographical Society. But in the thornier paths of politics and popular education as well as in the gracious fields of philanthropy he has laboured with that real zest and zeal which characterise the finest type of manhood—man "ever a fighter." The meeting held here on Mr. Steinthal's eightieth birthday was a remarkable gathering. Rarely are so many of our best men and women brought together as then met to do him honour. May it be a gracious memory for many years to our dear and trusted leader, and an inspiration to those who are to follow.

While we have been honouring our leader in the ranks of the ministry the "Fount of honour" has been graciously decorating one of our most distinguished and honoured laymen. In the Knighthood conferred on Sir W. H. Talbot, the King has not only honoured the great public service in which Sir William occupies one of the foremost positions—a service which with the vast growth of our municipality now rivals in importance and power the highest branches of the old civil service—but he has honoured personal qualities of heart and mind which have made a great position greater still. The honour in which we are all rejoicing is a seal set on a great career, but, better still, a seal set on character and ability. Sir William has been an honoured figure in all our gatherings for many years, while Lady Talbot has been a gracious presence and an active influence for good in all our collective undertakings. By a happy coincidence she was opening the bazaar at our Chorlton-cum-Hardy Church the very day the newly-conferred dignity was announced. In the expressions of their great joy in the event speakers at the opening ceremony nearly forgot the objects of the bazaar. But it did not really suffer, for there was a great gathering of friends, and the receipts exceeded all expectations, and so the King assisted, all unconsciously, to give a helping hand to a good cause.

And now I have given so much of my limited space to "men," I hardly know where to begin with our many "movements." So to begin on a cheering note, let me put on record the pleasure with which our District Association has just welcomed a new congregation into its ranks. Other new congregations we have had in recent years, several of them, congregations planted and watered by the Association itself, but never before a congregation like this. For the congregation at Lower Mosley-street fulfils the prescribed conditions of highest worth in that it has grown and not been made. It is the crown on the century of active service which the Lower Mosley-street schools have rendered to the community. While it carries the imagination back to old heroic days, to Travers Madge and others, it also points on to a happy future. It must be peculiarly pleasing to the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, who has worked so successfully at the schools for the past five years. With 650 scholars in the schools, 250 of them over 16 years of age, with crowded activities occupying every room every night of the week, and now with an established and flourishing congregation, this, one of the oldest of our local centres of work, is exhibiting that perpetual youth which should be the product of a gospel of faith and love.

Strengthened by this latest accession to its ranks, the District Association, which now includes twenty-three congregations, is pushing on with its arrangements for its great bazaar. The need of the bazaar—or of the money it will raise—is urgent. It is not intended to launch new ventures but to nourish the young life in some of the newer as well as to help sustain the activities of our older congregations. The general appeal will be issued forthwith, and a generous response is anticipated. Meanwhile, I note a growing dislike in some congregations to bazaars as means of raising funds. They will subscribe to the fund, but they will not join in the bazaar. It is not my business to criticise them, but I cannot help thinking that they exclude many young people and others by this decision from a harmless interest and from their only possible way of helping the common cause.

We are not able in Manchester to emulate our Liverpool friends and establish a large book depot of our own, and so we are doing the next best thing. We have arranged with Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, a leading firm of booksellers, to keep the publications of our Associations in stock and on view. A guarantee fund has been raised to insure them against loss, but it is hoped that our friends will give the effort so much support that it will not have to be called upon.

The Provincial Assembly belongs to all Lancashire and Cheshire. But what are Lancashire and Cheshire (pace Liverpool) but gathering grounds for Manchester? And so I take leave to mention here that the Provincial Assembly will meet in the Memorial Hall on Wednesday next, December 19, at three o'clock in the afternoon, to pass resolutions on the maladministration of the Congo Free State. Manchester has been very deeply stirred over this question, and a town's meeting has already passed judgment on the system which makes possible the atrocities which have been committed. It is hoped we shall have a large meeting of the Assembly, and as an inducement to others, in addition to ministers and delegates, to attend, it is announced that after the official vote a further popular vote on the resolutions will be taken, in which all present will be asked to take part.

No Provincial Letter is complete, come it whence it may, if it does not mention the Van Mission. Most of them speak only from report, or else they voice the hopes of their district that the van will soon be coming their way. We in Manchester speak of the things we know. For the Van Mission is very much with us. It has just been holding what our Methodist brethren would call a camp meeting here. But Manchester skies are not favourable to camping, and so the Mission had to seek the friendly shelter of the Memorial Hall. The meetings were not largely attended, but they were enthusiastic to a degree. The number of ministers who had travelled long distances in order to be present was remarkable. There was a fine new spirit of enterprise and audacity in the air. The speakers had been under fire, most of them, and they were eager, like old war horses, to renew the experience. There could be no better testimony to the reality and worth of the Mission. For all these speakers had been voluntary workers. For them the Mission had meant hard work and some personal discomforts. If, then, they were eager to renew the experience, it could only mean that they had found in the Mission that response which makes all burdens and sacrifices light. Of the questions of policy discussed at the meeting, I am not free to speak beyond this, that whatever developments take place it is felt to be imperative that Mr. Spedding should remain at the head of the movement and that Lancashire should always be included in the field of operations. Nowhere else perhaps can we hope for quite the same effective results. Here our churches are thicker on the ground than anywhere else. No inquirer whose interest has been aroused at a Van meeting would be hopelessly out of reach of one of our churches. Still, there are many towns here where we are unrepresented, and a wise policy would be to work to fill up these gaps, to make one county strong and secure, and then to work outward from it as a centre. Would not this be better than planting isolated churches in a hostile atmosphere, where they must soon become forlorn hopes?

Of the more domestic concerns of our churches here and of the combined missions which we are planning for January and February, I have no space left to treat. I hope to have an opportunity of writing of these things early in the new year. Meanwhile, we are all planning our Christmas festivities. The weather here is most seasonable; the shops are beginning to dress for the part; the unemployed have fallen lower in numbers than last year; trade is excellent, our country is at peace with the world, and we are in the mood to keep the Feast.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Bell-Street Domestic Mission.

—The Rev. S. H. Street writes from 4, Avenue-villas, Cricklewood-lane, N.W.:—"May I once again ask you to insert a Christmas appeal on behalf of our Mission. I am to a large extent dependent on the gifts received at this time for the supply of my Poor's Purse for the year, as well as for the special Christmas festivities and gifts. I should like also to again say how glad we should be if we could secure more workers for our Sunday-school. The school has largely increased during the year, but not the staff of teachers, and we are obliged now to seriously consider whether we ought to refuse further new scholars. This, of course, we are most anxious not to do. May I also take this opportunity of saying that books for our library will be most welcome, books especially for use by members of our girls' club."

Bradford: West Bowling.—A tea-meeting was held last Saturday, in Broadway Avenue Church, to celebrate the opening of the church free from debt. There was a large attendance, and the proceedings were very enthusiastic. Mr. F. W. Marsland presided, and after a report of substantial progress had been given by the secretary, congratulatory speeches were made by Mrs. Ceredig Jones, the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones and John Ellis, Mr. J. L. Badland, and others, and acknowledged by the Rev. W. Rosling.

Derby.—The biennial bazaar in aid of the funds of Friargate Chapel, opened on Thursday Dec 6, by the Hon. F. Strutt, and continued on the two following days, was a great success. Mr. W. J. Piper, J.P., presided at the opening, and the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland made a statement as to the position of the congregation, referring to the grievous loss they had sustained through the death on that day of Mr. S. D. Hall. He expressed the great pleasure they felt in the presence of Mr. Strutt, the earlier members of whose family had been closely associated with that chapel. Mr. Strutt, speaking as a Churchman, said he took a keen interest in the chapel for reasons Mr. Buckland had named. His grandfather's grave was close to where he stood. He thought Churchmen ought to take a sympathetic interest in the doings of their Nonconformist brethren, and he congratulated them especially upon their Sunday-school. Ald. Moss, of Loughborough, President of the North Midland Association was the opener on Friday, and on Saturday, Miss Catherine Gittins, of Leicester. The bazaar is expected to realise over £200.

Doncaster.—The second lecture of the series on Religious Beliefs at they are to-day was given on Monday, Nov. 26, in the Central Hall by the Rev. J. E. Manning, who took as his topic, "The Mysteries of God and the Mysteries of the Theologians." Questions were asked and answered at the close. The third lecture, on Dec. 3, was by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, his topic being "Religion, its Nature and Reasonableness." Last Monday the lecturer was the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, on "What think ye of Christ?" In the course of his lecture he expressed his concurrence with men of the school of the Revs. R. J. Campbell and Rhonda Williams in the distinction between the idea of deity and the idea of divinity as applied to Christ—the postulate of deity being absurd in every way, but the postulate of divinity being quite admissible in view of the assumption of the immanence of God in all men.

Ipswich.—A course of special Sunday evening sermons, begun on November 18 by Mr. R. H. Fuller, with an address on "Religion with Creed or Shrine," and continued by the minister, the Rev. L. Tavenor, with sermons on Religion before and after Christ, have been attended by good congregations. The social guild is carrying through an excellent winter programme.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—At last week's meeting of the Rathbone Literary Club the Rev. J. Collins Odgers lectured on "The Oldest Book in the World, The Instruction of Ptah-hotop." The book which was discovered near Heliopolis in Lower Egypt, is said to be some 5,400 years old. In reporting the previous meeting of the club, at which Mrs. H. D. Roberts lectured on "The Influence of Woman in Shakespeare," we inadvertently attributed a statement to her which she did not make: to the effect that in Elizabethan times Peeresses sat in Parliament. What gave rise to the mistake was a reference which Mrs. Roberts made to the custom under the Plantagenets of summoning Peeresses to Parliament. As a privilege in days of difficult travelling, a Peeress was permitted to choose a proxy to appear for her; as for instance, Alicia de Bigod sent two proxies (35 Ed. I.); and the Harleian MS. gives a long list of Peeresses summoned to send each a proxy to consult with the King and his Council at Westminster (35 Ed. III., Harl. MS., 778). It does not seem to be implied that the Peeresses themselves would not have been admitted if they had chosen to appear. But apparently they did not so choose.

London: Essex Church.—At the evening service, to-morrow, Handel's "Messiah" will be sung by an augmented choir.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Edgar I. Fripp has been delivering a course of six lectures on the "Poems of Robert Browning," in the Rosslyn Hill school-room, on Monday evenings. The audiences averaged 150, and increased continuously from the first lecture. Mr. Fripp's lectures were full of fine appreciation and insight; they were remarkable both for artistic feeling and dramatic power. A very cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer at the close, last Monday evening, moved by Mr. E. K. Blyth, seconded by Miss Drewry, and supported and put to the meeting by the Rev. H. Gow.

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday last the Rev. J. Page Hopps lectured in the Avondale-road Church on the Religious Value of the Unitarian Faith. He emphasised the need for more insistence on the affirmations of Unitarianism, rather than as was too often the case, a statement of mere negations.

London: Rhyll-street Mission.—Dr. Read begs to acknowledge with many thanks the receipt of post office orders for £1 5s. on behalf of the mission, from W. W.

Loughborough.—A series of four special week-night services was concluded on Dec. 6. The first of the series was held on Nov. 15, when the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, delivered a capital address on "The Deity of Christ or the Divinity of Man." The night was wild and stormy, but a few strangers were present, including a Baptist evangelist who took copious notes. Three friends from Coalville also attended in spite of a walk of nine and a half miles after service. A week later the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, took the service, and pleaded for more earnestness and enthusiasm in matters of religion, pointing out the danger of indifference which too often appeared in a time of material prosperity. The Rev. A. H. Thomas, of the Great Meeting, Leicester, followed on Nov. 29, and gave a helpful sermon on Salvation. The last of the series were taken by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, minister of the chapel, who dealt with the topic of Everlasting Punishment.

Mottram.—The diamond jubilee of the opening of the school and chapel building, November 15, 1846, was celebrated by a sale of work held on December 7 and 8, opened by Mr. C. D. Schwann, M.P., and Mr. W. Hudson, of Hyde (treasurer, East Cheshire Christian Union), chairmen, Rev. H. Bodell Smith (resident minister) and Rev. Noah Green (previous minister), proceeds about £100, or nearly £70 clear of expenses; also by the annual party, November 17, when over 230 sat down to tea and more than 300 attended the meeting afterwards under the chairmanship of Mr. John Hall Brooks, of Hyde; by the chapel anniversary sermons, November 25, preacher, Rev. A. R. Andreae, of Gee Cross; and by the erection of a house for the minister, which is now almost completed. The Mottram Christian Church had a Wesleyan origin anterior to 1791, when the first chapel was erected, became Methodist New Connexion in 1798, "Christian Brethren," after Joseph Barker, 1841, discovered themselves Unitarian 1845, and erected the present chapel 1846.

South Shields.—A bazaar in aid of Unity Church, with the chief object of raising funds for a minister's stipend was opened on Wednesday, December 5, by Lady Ellis, her husband, Sir J. Baxter Ellis, presiding. They both expressed cordial sympathy with the efforts of the congregation, and the vote of thanks was proposed by Alderman Bowman, seconded by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The bazaar was continued on the following day. Of the result we have not yet heard.

Walthamstow: Opening of New School-room.—A beautifully decorated and well equipped iron building attached to the church, affording much-needed accommodation for the growing Sunday-school, was opened last Saturday afternoon by Lady Durning-Lawrence. The church itself has also been thoroughly refitted, and many improvements made. There was a large gathering of members and friends, when Lady Durning-Lawrence, in a brief speech, declared the schoolroom open. Tea was served, and afterwards Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence presided over a large public meeting held in the renovated church. After the chairman's opening remarks, Miss Sharpe, Principal Gordon, and the Rev. Charles Roper, offered their good wishes to the congregation and their minister, the Rev. W. H. Rose. Mr. Gordon dwelt on the need for a more insistent appeal to the people, for the uplifting of character and a loftier ideal of life, and Mr. Roper said he believed it was still necessary for Unitarians to preach a definite doctrine as well as to work in social enterprises. Mr. John Harrison and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards brought greetings from the London District Unitarian Association and the London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly. Mr. F. Withal spoke on behalf of the Highgate Church, which was so intimately connected with the founding of the Walthamstow Church. Mr. W. J. Noel spoke on behalf of the Stratford congregation, who had much in common with Walthamstow, and were feeling the benefit of some little combined work. On Sunday Principal Gordon preached special sermons, morning and evening, the chapel being full on each occasion, and a largely attended afternoon children's service was addressed by Messrs. G. Skelt and W. J. Noel. The congregation has still a church debt to face, but there is now better hope of future progress.

Wolverhampton.—Two very successful "At Homes" were held at All Souls' Church on Monday and Tuesday. The minister, the Rev. J. A. Shaw, took the chair on Monday, when Mr. R. L. Impey, J.P., was the guest of the evening, and, though not a Unitarian, expressed his pleasure at being there. On Tuesday Councillor Evan Evans presided, and Mr. Shaw opened the proceedings.

In a recent number of the Methodist Times the Rev. Henry Martin, M.A., deals with the drink question as part of a wider social problem. The answer to the question: "Why do the poor drink?" he says, will be found in answering this other question: "How do the poor live?" He enumerates poverty, irregularity of employment, unhealthy conditions of labour, and overcrowding as factors in the evil of drunkenness, and reminds us that the improvement of social conditions should supplement the ever-needed appeal to the individual and the stricter control of the liquor traffic. "Every temperance reformer should be a social reformer as well."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PEACE SUNDAY and then Christmas Day. Heartiest good wishes to all friends near and distant! To the children a "Merry Christmas!" And so to all who can rejoice with them in their great festival. And to the burdened and the sorrowful a deep and quiet gladness, and new vision of that perfect Love, which is yet over all!

THE result of the appeal for the Martineau Memorial at Norwich, published in THE INQUIRER of December 1, so far as there has yet been response, will be found advertised in another column. These fresh gifts, generous and most welcome they are, amount to not quite a half of what is required; and if we did not feel that there was yet time to complete the fund, we should have to acknowledge a very keen disappointment. When we wrote on this subject, as we did on December 1, it was not without having counted the cost, and we were ready, if there should be no better issue, to be in this matter "a fool for Christ's sake." But we had very much rather find the general sense of what we as a people owe to Dr. Martineau, in gratitude and reverence for his memory, sufficient to meet this urgent need, to complete a worthy memorial, and to secure adequate equipment for the work in his native city, which he certainly would have had very much at heart.

AFTER protracted suspense, there is a certain relief now that Mr. Birrell's Education Bill has been "killed" by the House of Lords. His own declaration, endorsed by the Premier, was that the Government had "no use for such a Bill" as it became in the Upper House. Grave observers of the negotiations recently carried on were distinctly of opinion that concession from the Liberal side was going too far, and that "such a Bill" as was likely to emerge would prove a serious stumbling-block in the path of educational progress. On all sides, nearly, it is admitted that the terms offered to the denominationalists were generous, and few, if any, now believe that such terms will be offered again by a Liberal Government. The next Education Bill, come when it may, will probably be much simpler and more drastic. The old story of the Sybilline Books suggests itself, and the clergy may soon recall it with regret as they feel the administrative pressure which is sure to be put upon them in the near future.

MEANWHILE two aspects of deep concern are manifest. By the reversal of the judgment of the Court of Appeal, in what is known as the West Riding case, the local authorities are declared to be responsible under Mr. Balfour's Act for the full cost of denominational religious instruction, although they have not the power of control. The teachers, too, who are to receive their salaries from the public purse, are to be limited to a special sect at the option of the managers of these "non-provided" schools. The injustices that provoked "passive resistance" thus stand out in all their harshness, just at the moment when a measure designed to remedy the evil has been of the House of Lords has brought up in an acute form the anomaly of our legislative system, which maintains a permanent and overwhelming majority of one particular party in the Upper House. We expect that the present House of Commons will not dissolve without initiating far-reaching changes in this respect.

FRIENDS will be thankful to hear of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson's continued, though slow, progress towards recovery. He was downstairs again on Tuesday for the first time, and hopes to be able to undertake the journey to Switzerland in the first week of the New Year, where the splendid mountain air has in previous years done so much to restore his vigour.

THE CHRIST.

DEEP in the heart of God the Lord
From all eternity,
Before He spake the mighty word
By which the earth should be,
There dwelt the vast creative plan,
And as its crown the Ideal Man!

Age after age of fleeting time
Whose secrets none may tell;
Out of the fire-mist and the slime,
Out of the primal cell,
First beast, then savage, saint and seer,
The Man of God's own heart drew near.

What matters where he first drew breath,
In stable or in cot!
What matters that in life and death
He shared the common lot!
In life and death the meed was won:
The Father said, "This is My Son!"

Oh, happy they in whom there dwells,
Though dim and incomplete,
The dawning light that clear foretells
A coming Paraclete;
The Light that lighteth every man
Till he fulfils th' Eternal plan

And they in whom thus dwells the Light
Look back across the years.
To them, still clad in radiance bright,
A Son of God appears,
Who sets his glory on the race,
Crowned with celestial truth and grace:

Well may we keep our Christmastide
Well with glad heart and voice,
In songs of gladness, far and wide,
Bid all the earth rejoice:
Our Brother Christ speaks to each one,
"Be thou God's well-beloved Son!"

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, has been appointed Field-Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to take charge of the work of the Van Mission, which the Association has undertaken to direct, and to engage in other missionary work in the country. Mr. Spedding has therefore resigned his ministerial charge at Rochdale, which he has held, with great acceptance, for twenty years, and will probably take up his residence in or near Manchester. He has already proved his eminent fitness for the work to which his whole strength is now to be devoted, and he will enter upon his new duties with the most cordial good wishes of a wide circle of friends.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCA-SHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

CONGO FREE STATE.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Provincial Assembly was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, to consider the maladministration of the Congo Free State. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. Richard Robinson, and there was a large attendance of ministers and delegates. The Assembly was constituted by reading and prayer, and the calling of the roll.

The President then introduced the business, reminding the Assembly of the stand it had ever taken for civil and religious liberty. How these principles were outraged in the Congo was known now to all. Europe had sought to set up a benevolent rule there, but the trusteeship had been appropriated for the pecuniary benefit of the trustee. King Leopold claimed everything in the Congo as the property of himself and those associated with him, and its native inhabitants were made trespassers in their own country. Hence there had resulted a state of things which could only be described as the greatest international crime which had been committed since overseas slavery was abolished.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE moved :—

"That this Meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, 'having regard to the responsibility of Great Britain in the establishment of the Congo Free State, and the complete failure of the hopes of humane administration, in which the Berlin Treaty' was concluded, declares that the time 'has come when the present system 'must be ended by the action of the Powers, and calls upon His Majesty's Government to take immediate and 'decisive action towards this end.'"

In an able and eloquent address Mr. Agate told the story of the Congo; of its discovery by Stanley and the resultant interest in Europe as to its future rule. First Portugal was proposed, but eventually Belgium, or rather its King, was called to the task. In taking it up King Leopold declared "our only programme is the work of moral and material regeneration," but the desire for gain, working on a subtle conscience, had substituted for this ideal the most awful tyranny of our times. Mutilation, murder, and nameless horrors had been perpetrated in the name of the King, had fallen into a lower barbarism than that which, professedly, they went to reform. Belgium itself was not wholly insensible to the shame brought on it by its King. The clerical party supported the King, but the Socialist party had never ceased to expose the horrors and to denounce the methods of rule in the Congo. Now the Belgium Chamber, by 128 votes to 1, had declared for annexation. This was a move in the right direction; but Europe, and particularly England, must not resign their rights in the matter. If Belgium would act so as to wipe out the evil of the past and make its recurrence impossible, we should be satisfied; if not, Europe or England must act, and in acting England would move as one man to rescue the remnant of a wasted and stricken land.

Mr. T. FLETCHER ROBINSON (President of the Manchester District Association) seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously, first by the official vote of the ministers and delegates and afterwards by the general vote of all present.

Mr. A. NICHOLSON moved, and it was resolved, that the resolution should be sent to the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

SOME of us are a little tired of the word "environment." We are beginning to understand that the term "evolution"—well enough as an explanation of unconscious growth—is not the right term to use of conscious progress. The common use of the term environment is open to the same objection. It makes too much of the value of external conditions in determining human development. Man is not a product of his surroundings as a tree is the product of the climate and soil in which it withers or thrives. He is a conscious agent. Acted upon, he also reacts. A non-mechanical power within him asserts itself amidst the mechanical forces around him. His adaptations to new environment are not always progressive. He advances towards good or towards evil; rightly interprets external changes or misinterprets them; seizes them as occasions of improvement or perverts them. His aspirations cannot always be the consequences of material conditions, for they often precede them; his higher standards are higher because they rise above the level of existing facts. Every prophet, every martyr, every reformer is a witness to an innovating impulse which, so far from being the result of outward arrangement, anticipates it. In short, there is in humanity a spiritual factor to be reckoned with—not tamely responsive, actively independent, defying analysis and calculation, sometimes strangely at variance with outside influence, whether natural or economic, favourable or unfavourable.

It is one of the boasts of philosophy that there is in man a strength of soul which may, if he choose, secure him from the effect of circumstance: Only virtue is profitable; external goods, and the contingencies of external life, are indifferent; they contribute nothing to reason, and therefore nothing to happiness. By a cultivated apathy the soul may nurse its own sufficient life, and arrest the artificial excitement of appetite and sense. Poetry, if less austere, is not less disdainful of external help: The heroic figure in romance is not that of the man well furnished and equipped, moulded into excellence by soft pressure from without, but of one who draws from a source within, fights against great odds, fights single-handed, and strips himself of unacquired advantage and unearned aid. Native worth stands forth in proportion as it stands away from outward accident.

These contentions, on a firmer basis, are the contentions of religion. Gain out of loss, strength out of weakness, freedom through suffering, glorying in infirmities, having nothing and yet possessing everything—these are the sublime paradoxes of the Gospel. The Beatitudes are flat contradictions of the supposed "necessaries of life." Here is the presentation of a character to be developed under constraint and limitation—under just those hindrances which society is anxious to remove: Here, under a passive bearing, is an active antagonism, the working of an element pungent as "salt," with a savour of its own, seeking rather to give new flavour to the earth than to receive from the world—the encompassing milieu—that which the world is prepared to bestow. In some of the Parables we find the same refusal to allow that the character within is the issue of outside adjustment and supply. I have heard it said that the Parable of the Sower is a parable of environment. Yet even in the "good ground" the yield of the good seed ranged from a hundredfold to thirty. So in the Parable of the Barren Fig Tree the possibility is not lost sight of that, when all that nature and art together can do has been done, the tree may still bear no fruit. So also, in the Parable of the Seed Growing Secretly, the seed springs up, "he knoweth not how." And all this teaching is evidently based on the belief that there is in man an empowering spirit, the course of which is not to be explained by a naturalistic theory, an indwelling energy unfolding itself according to the law of spiritual being. This teaching may afterwards have been strained into a rigid doctrine of grace, with much needless antithesis, but it brings before the mind in a very striking way the difference between action from within and effect from without in human development, personal and social. Better still is it to think of the actual life which had for its earthly setting a stable, a carpenter's shop, and a fishing-boat. The old Christmas story, though much besides, is a wholesome lesson in bionomics.

CHRISTMAS GUESTS.

FAITH divine, all fear transcending,
Courage true, to cheer and guide,
With the household virtues blending,
Be your friends this Christmastide;
Give you holy dreams and bright,
Calm, in clear celestial light;
Blessing this your habitation
With the music of salvation.

Hope divine, all doubt defeating,
Joy the inspirer, swift and strong,
Thrill through every Christmas greetings,
Shine through every Christmas song;
Heart's desire and soul's request
Meet to welcome Christ the Guest;
Blessing this your habitation
With the music of salvation.

Love divine, all strife dispelling,
Peace, the Herald of the Lord,
Make your home their Christmas dwelling
Here to give you large reward;
Peace, Good-will, Faith, Hope and Love

Blessing this your habitation
With the music of salvation.

HERBERT RIX'S LAST WORK: "TENT AND TESTAMENT."*

THIS goodly volume, which appears so close to the end of the year as to bear next year's date on its title-page, will be welcomed by many for tender personal reasons. Unless we are mistaken, however, it will win recognition far beyond the wide circle of those who knew the author. Indeed, we have the highest authority for saying that it will take rank at once as a part of the apparatus needed by all Biblical students.

The publisher's note appended to the preface records the pathetic fact that while the book was going through the press its author died. Friendly hands had to take up the work, but happily it was already so far forward that the duties devolving upon them were chiefly mechanical. I trust that my own share in these pious duties, following on much conference and correspondence with Mr. Rix, may not unfit me to introduce the book to the readers of the INQUIRER.

The full title, quoted below, sufficiently indicates the general scope of the book; and the route map supplies at a glance the extent of the author's travels. They included visits, in the spring of 1901, to all the chief places on the central line of Western Palestine from Hebron to Nazareth, and north-eastward to Cæsarea Philippi and the slopes of Hermon, with special excursions about the Sea of Galilee, and in the middle and lower Jordan regions. The favoured reader who has visited the Holy Land observes at once the fidelity and suggestiveness of the descriptions given as the author leads him on from site to site; but probably those who never were or will be pilgrims, but who are truly interested in the Bible times and people, will be even more indebted to the book. The greater part of it, indeed, is full of "popular" interest. Mr. Rix so often addressed audiences on these topics that he evidently developed a keen sense of what it is the average mind is interested to learn about the present condition and aspect of the country. His photographs, copiously supplied throughout the volume and on the whole extremely well reproduced,† differ from the stock illustrations just in being glimpses of actual life and important archaeology and landscape selected by a shrewd and sympathetic eye. He writes, too, as if he were telling a friend what happened, how and where the tiny experiences and the people met. His artistic tastes show themselves in many a graphic touch of writing, as well as in the delicate drawing of the frontispiece; and his never-failing humour lights up the pages again and again. Hills, valleys, plains, fields, gardens, wells, fountains, streams, trees, bushes, flowers, beasts, birds, butterflies, men, women, children, dwellings, dresses, occupations, talk, singing, customs—the peopled earth and the splendid heavens—all come here pictorially before our eyes; and unless one is very determined to pay the price, in money and rough travel, and go to Palestine in his own vulnerable person, he can hardly do better than join Mr. Rix's company and travel in his book with him. He will certainly understand his "Testament," the better for having journeyed with this "Tent."

Which "Testament"? Chiefly the New. It is true that a great deal is said that valuably illustrates the Old, especially in the Hebron, Shechem, Samaria and Jerusalem sections. But the author's chief interest in the Holy Land gathered, one sees clearly, about the life of Jesus Christ. It was his aim to visit, as far as possible, every place associated with his memory in the Gospels; and except that "the coasts of Tyre and Sidon" were perforce omitted, and a portion of the lower Jordan Valley which presumably the Master traversed on his last journey to Jerusalem, Mr. Rix fully carried out his programme. Some of the places have, indeed, but a shadowy and indirect connection with the great life, as we have come to conceive it; but it is something to stand and gaze at places long supposed to have been visited by Jesus. The author even extends a discriminating indulgence to the fancies of ancient pilgrims. But with respect to Galilee and its lake, there can be no doubt as to the region as a whole, and the same is true as to Jerusalem, though particular sites, both north and south, are, and probably will ever remain, subjects of controversy. The author preserves throughout a judicial tone, but on some points his mind is made up, and he gives the reader the benefit (and it is a benefit) of convinced decision on several noteworthy points. The position of Capernaum is one of these, the topography of the Temple Hill and its southern slope downward to Siloam's pool another; and the descriptions given of scenes at these places, for instance, as they shaped themselves to the author's mind, are most helpful and illuminating. The reality of the beloved Master's life stands forth more clearly for these pages. The work is much more than a book of travel, far other than a collection of critical notes. It is the contribution of a reverent but fearless mind to the truth as it really was "in Jesus," the Prophet of Nazareth.

Thus far may be addressed to persons who have little or no expert knowledge of the controversial points of the Palestine sites. Such persons were obviously kept most in view by the author during the first five-sixths of his book. If then, like the homeward boat at Jaffa they may do so, and still be greatly his debtor. They will not only have been interested, they will have learned much. But for closer students the last section of the book is of the highest importance. Mr. Rix was no light-hearted tourist. The copious references to be found throughout the work show him to have been a sound and accurate scholar. But this character emerges brilliantly in the section referred to. Here are appended six keenly critical arguments concerning the oft-debated questions of Nazareth, Bethlechem, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Bethesda, and Herod's Temple. Of these appendices the most important, certainly the most copious, is that dealing with Capernaum. I venture to doubt whether the evidence on the subject has ever before been presented with such fulness, or discussed with such balance of judgment. Some of the points may appear to be of relatively small importance, but collectively they form a very strong case for the author's view, which locates the city where Jesus took up his residence, not at the site known as Tell Hum, but at Minyeh, two miles or so to the south-west along the shores of the Sea of Galilee. To enter upon the details would take up more space than I can claim, at least if justice were done to the twenty-four pages of close reasoning involved. The Bethsaida, discussion, too, contains some highly suggestive Gospel criticism. In the author's view the only Bethsaida was that situated at the north end of the lake, east of the Jordan's inflow. Here it is usual to locate "Bethsaida Julias," and another town of the name is looked for on the western shore. Mr. Rix, as the result of long study, had come to the conclusion that the district adjacent to "Bethsaida Julias," and not that place alone, was called Bethsaida; and he would find the fishing port of this name at Mesadiyah on the lake side. The point is a very interesting one, and the analysis of the Synoptic materials referring to the position of Bethsaida is specially worthy of attention.

This portion of the book is itself a monument to the author's industry, sagacity, and fairness of mind. Whatever differences of judgment may remain between him and his critics, it cannot be said that he has spared himself pains in collecting pertinent facts, or clouded the subject with any of the prejudices, and even bitterness of temper, that have sometimes added their peculiar bane to a land that has enough woes of its own to suffer.

A word of hearty acknowledgment should be given to the publishers. They present the work in an attractive guise, with good cover and full index, and the two folding maps supplied will enable the reader to pursue the story and critical discussions with the maximum of ease.

W. G. TARRANT.

CHRISTMAS COLOUR.

"Dead seasons quicken in one petal-spot
Of colour unforgot."

In the noble "Hymn to Colour" George Meredith pours forth his virile and aspiring soul with a fervour that is nothing mon things of life—the grass blades and the flowers, the dew-drops and thistledown, steeped as they are in the "fount of the Untimed," and links them to the great mysteries that lie beyond our ken, of which beauty always prophesies to a true poet. Through knowledge of the loveliness of earth he recognises that

"Men come out of brutishness
To spell the letters of the sky;"

and at the last he tells us how, blest by this vision,

"Life ere long
Came on me in the public ways, and bent Eyes deeper than of old: Death met I too,
And saw the Dawn glow through."

The spirit of Meredith stirs oftener in people at Christmas-time than at any other season of the year, and even those whom the delights of spring and summer leave apparently unmoved, are galvanised into at least a semblance of joy at the Festival of Noel. This is not entirely due to the sacred associations which hallow it; indeed, despite church services and carol-singing, these associations enter little, it would seem, into the gladness with which a large number of people holding diverse religious opinions welcome Christmas. But it is due to a craving in the hearts of all of us (felt more poignantly in the winter days), for a glow and brightness in life which circumstances often cruelly deny us. Pagans we are, more than we dream, and not to be robbed of pleasure because we have developed a passion for ethics. Those who are conscious at Christmas-time of a freshening and deepening of the inner life, have won, indeed, "the consecration and the poet's dream." But to others, also, it brings some degree of glow and colour, and for this reason undoubtedly the season is welcomed by them.

Why are there not more "hymns," in the manner of Meredith's, to that great power which transmutes the very dust beneath our feet when an urgent sun is shining? Why, when we talk of "brightness," and "cheerfulness," do we not oftener refer to the beneficent work done by the sheer splendour of green, and red, and yellow? Perhaps it is because of our Northern climate that we English people talk so little of these things, and go on contentedly (or with dull patience), pursuing our daily tasks under skies that would rob a Southerner of the very desire to live. Yet the love of colour lies warm at our hearts, and it is manifested by the joy—sometimes shamefaced, but generally frank and unconcealed—with which, for one day in the year, most people endeavour to make the cold heart of winter warm as a rose in June. The blazing fire, the well-spread table, the heaped-up fruits, the garlands of laurel and holly-berries, the bowls of crimson flowers, the frosty blue sky (if Nature wills it!) the robin's red breast, as he sings outside the window, and last, but not least, the faces of the children laughing over their brightly-painted toys—these contribute incalculably to the stock of cheerfulness which all men require in order to do their work healthily and effectively. It is not the "blues" that we suffer from so much as the "greys," not the realisation of this oftener, poets would soul's bridegroom," who, by his power, "brings heaven to the flower."

Many people, in their dislike of crudeness and sensationalism, have developed a taste for neutral tints, and delicate shades, which rules them in their decorative schemes, and make their homes very delightful and restful havens for the imagination to dwell in undisturbed. As a race, however, we suffer from a suppression of the colour instinct almost as much as from a tendency to hide our emotions, which we seem to think such discreditable attributes of human beings. And Nature flouts us with the scarlet of the poppy, and the greenness of young grass—with the orange hues of lichens, and the startlingly clear yellow of the daffodils so loved by Wordsworth. Colour tells more than scent or form in an English spring, as everyone knows who has waded through meadows golden with buttercups, gazed on patches of wild hyacinths of heavenly blue in many a quiet glade, or plucked wild roses, with the pink glow of the dawn in them, "under the quicken boughs" in May. And, soothing as are our English skies after the glare and heat of the cloudless heavens of Italy or Spain, probably our thoughts never reach such a pitch of exaltation as when, from some lonely hillside (or perhaps from a crowded bridge in London!) we watch the scarlet and gold flaming in the west as the sun goes down. At such moments, however dull and drab the day may have been, one is wistfully aware of thoughts and hopes too great for utterance, but not one feels, too great for ultimate fulfilment, somehow—somewhere!

When we plead for the poorer and more struggling members of humanity that their lives are "so colourless," we, speak, not in a symbolic, but in a literal manner. The absence of health and joy really do mean the absence of colour also. Vigorous, happy men and women are not pale, neither are their eyes dull; but they carry about with them the glow of an active and beautifully ordered life, the buoyancy of which seems to be borrowed from childhood, and their mere presence sets the blood singing in the veins of the melancholy and sad. They are like the red tulips with which we love to adorn our tables at Christmas-time—fresh, and ruddy, and fragrant, with sunshine stored up in every fibre of their being. And they are the people who, obedient to instincts which everybody has in a greater or less degree, kindle to the chimes of "Merry Yule," that ring in, as they should do, a new time of progress and happiness for the world. Some reflective souls have wondered why frank merry-making should be associated with the name of him whose life was one of struggle and poverty, and whose death was the saddest and most lamentable that history has recorded. They forget how the Man of Nazareth loved the flowers of the field and the birds of the air—village festivities, and the entertainment of his friends; above all, the laughing faces of little children. They forget that the sorrows of his life were only part of the system he came to overthrow; and that through his darkest hours he was faithful to that glowing ideal of Love and Joy which, when it is truly understood by mankind, will solve all our social and throw down every barrier that now separates men of different nations and creeds from each other.

LAURA ACKROYD.

"ARISE, SHINE, FOR THY LIGHT IS COME."

WE think specially at this season of the coming of the true light into men's homes. They are darkened sometimes not only by perplexity and sorrow, but by selfishness and sin, by cruelty and wrong. But the heavenly light is there, and it will enter in, if men be only ready to receive it. Sometimes it bursts through thick clouds of selfishness, and spreads a divine glory round about. Sang the old poet Tusser: "At Christmas we banket, the riche and the poore;

Who then (but the miser) but openeth his doore?"

At Christmas, of Christ many carols we sing,
And give many gifts for the joy of that King."

Christmas has been emphatically a home festival in England for nearly or quite six centuries; so is it, and so has it been in many another land. If it does not deepen in us love for our homes, and strengthen our desire and determination to show more devotedly our love for those who share our homes, it misses much of its inspiration for us.

We smile sometimes at the stories which describe the thawing of icy natures, the softening of hard hearts, at Christmas. But there is a significance in all these whether they be fact or fiction, or long-cherished legend. They are but in keeping with the time-honoured stories first told generations back of the response of outward Nature to the glow and gladness of the season. Old legends tell how, on the marvellous night on which the Saviour was born, the most extraordinary things happened. The animals rejoiced in the salvation that was bestowed on the world, in the rivers there ran wine instead of water, and the trees of the forest began to bud and bloom all in one night in spite of the ice and snow with which the fields were covered. Ecclesiastical fancy played with these things, and eloquent preachers drew from them an added impressiveness for their sermons, so that at last it became a popular belief that every year at the hour when Christ was born, the same miracles happened again. It is nearly a thousand years since the story was first told in the East that on the night between the 24th and 25th of December, the trees of the forest actually stand in full blossom, and the beliefs spread far and wide over Europe. So firmly rooted did the legend become that early in the fifteenth century the Bishop of Bamberg tells in a letter to a friend of two apple trees which on Christmas night blossomed and ripened. A nobleman, he says testifies to the truth of this, describing the colour of the apples and stating that he had held them in his hands. The same story of a miraculous tree comes also from the neighbourhood of Nurnberg. During the night which preceded the dawn of Christmas Day this tree also bore apples, and every year trustworthy people went to the place from Nurnberg and the neighbouring regions, and kept watch all night to test the truth of the thing! Then there is the old old story of the blossoming every year on the eve of the Nativity of the thorn-staff which Joseph of Arimathea brought with him from Palestine and planted at Glastonbury, and from this thorn slips were cut and planted which possessed the same marvellous quality as the parent-tree. It is all very simple and childish, if you will. But it has its lesson. If we are so disposed, we may, I imagine, find a rational explanation of the beginning of the story in the sights which meet us in hedgerow and garden, when the Christmas season is very mild, as is sometimes the case. Then the buds are plain upon the trees and flowers are blossoming, though this is by no means always so. And in many a home and many a school the Christmas tree bursts into light and bears its wondrous fruitage of gifts. Modern Christmas tree or ancient apple or blossoming thorn—the story of the thorn is told so recently as a century and a half ago—I read them all as parables. The divine light, which is warmth and life as well as brightness, has come once more to earth; and that soulless things should respond to it, and break into bloom and beauty, does but suggest that human spirits fail of their God-given faculty if they too do not mirror back the heavenly radiance. “Arise, shine, for thy light is come.”

We look back across all the years and centuries that separate us from the first Christmas Day. Joseph and Mary could have had no idea of what that new life entrusted to their keeping was to mean to the world. But we know that, for the world, the message of light in heart and home was bound up with the birth of a child. And the Christ-child, the first-born of his parents, was the type of many another light of life which comes in like manner into the home. All can enter into the happiness of the children, and see in each new-born babe an image of the Christ-child. If some of the thousands of millions who have been born since that day have been untrue or only partly true to their calling, how many have grown up to be faithful children of God. There is a quaint thought in an old Italian poet, Jacopone da Todi, which has been put into graceful English verse. The vision of the angels singing at the Saviour's birth is familiar to us all. The Italian poet varies the picture for us by representing some of the angels as children:

“Little angels all around
Danced, and carols flung;
Making verselets sweet and true,
Still of love they sung;
Calling saints, and sinners too,
With love's tender tongue.”

I like that thought of the “little angels” dancing for very joy, and conscious of a message which can be melodiously uttered in love to all the world. For all the world consists either of saints or sinners, or of those who are a more or less perplexing combination of both. If, as the Master himself has told us, God “maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust,” is not that which is true of outward light true also of the Christmas glory which can shine into the soul? Would to God that, at this Christmastide, to all darkened hearts the cleansing light might come, casting out all darkness, and lifting the penitent soul once more into the gladness of divine communion. I know in truth that no vast change will come over the mass of men, but I rejoice to think that some unaccustomed souls will respond to the heavenly message, and that a gentler spirit will for the time rule in thousands of hearts. “Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.”

DENDY AGATE.

The knot that we cut by some fine heady quarrel-scene in private life, or in public affairs, by some denunciatory act against what we are pleased to call our neighbour's vices, might yet have been unwoven by the hand of sympathy.—

OBITUARY.

JAMES HOWARD BROOKS.

WE record with sincerest regret the death of Mr. James Howard Brooks, of Fulsham Park. Mr. Brooks died suddenly on Thursday, December 13, at the age of seventy-six. He had been transacting some little business in Wilmslow, and had just returned home after a brisk walk. He had barely been seated to read a paper when a sudden pain at the heart seized him, and in a moment he had passed away, in the presence of one of his daughters. It was probably such a death as he himself would gladly have chosen, being a man who lived in the spirit of a well-known prayer, aspiring to be “ready for danger, serene in death.” Indeed, readiness, preparedness, and serenity, in all things seemed to those of us who were only privileged to know him in old age, to be the most conspicuous marks of his character. We have often thought as we noted his marvellously painstaking carefulness and precision in some of the arduous tasks which to the last he conscientiously fulfilled, that he must have adopted as his motto in life the classic words: “Method gives light”; and there followed as a natural consequence a bright, if also a slightly austere serenity of bearing toward all men. His heart was at leisure from itself.

James Howard Brooks was born at Gee Cross, in the year 1830, the only son of the Rev. James Brooks, a native of Mossley, who had been originally an itinerant minister in the Methodist New Connexion, but from 1806 to 1854 was minister of Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross. The son was educated at the Rev. Henry Green's well-known school at Knutsford, where Philip and Alfred Holt, Philip Rathbone, Thomas Gair and others were among his school-fellows. In 1844 he entered Manchester New College, then still in Manchester, as a lay student, and in 1848 graduated B.A. in the London University. At college Francis Newman and James Martineau were among his teachers, and H. W. Crosskey, Charles Beard, T. E. Poynting, J. Dendy, and R. H. Hutton fellow students. In 1854 Mr. Brooks was admitted as a solicitor, and practised first by himself in Cross-street, Manchester, and afterwards as partner in the firm of Brooks, Marshall & Brooks. In 1866 he married Mary, the daughter of John O'Brien, and while his home was in Dukinfield, he took a deep interest in the Old Chapel, as he did afterwards, on his removal to Monton in 1876 in the Church and Day and Sunday-schools there. He was chairman of the building committee of the Monton Memorial Schools, and had himself a large class of young men. He left Monton in 1891, and, after two years abroad, settled at Wilmslow, and there again he was deeply interested in the old Dean Row chapel, a constant and most helpful member of the congregation. Mrs. Brooks died in 1901. At the Centenary of Manchester College Mr. Brooks became a trustee, and was for years a valued member of the committee. He took an important part on the sub-committee for the new buildings at Oxford.

Many friends will be thankful, as we are, for the following lines from the Rev. Philip Wicksteed:—

“When I settled at Dukinfield (in 1870) all I knew of James Brooks and his wife was that I had been told they were likely to sympathise with what were then considered my ‘advanced views.’ When first I called I found Mrs. Brooks in the surroundings of what was outwardly an ordinary middle-class English home; but I had not been in it two minutes before a sense of distinction asserted itself. And the more we came to know the Brookses the deeper this sense became. It was first and foremost distinction of character, honesty and directness of vision, looking life right in the face with steady insight, united to perfect trust and confidence. A more wholesome atmosphere I have never breathed. But there was intellectual distinction also: Not learning, but an unusually broad culture, which Mrs. Brooks owed largely to her mother, Mrs. John Ogden, and that eye to the essential which goes with freedom from affectation, directness of moral perceptions, and touch with actual life. Mrs. Brooks would speak of Italian classics or American humorists with equal simplicity, as the subjects of conversation happened to bring them up, and with no more self-consciousness in one case than in the other. Keeness and serenity were combined in rare fashion in her large and generous nature. Truth and goodness asserted themselves in her growing family, not by discipline, but by irresistible atmospheric penetration.

“We soon came to know her husband, too, and more than thirty years of friendship enriched our lives. Mrs. Brooks died years ago, and left her husband an aged but not a broken man, for he had his children still about him, and life had brought him more than death could take away. As I think of him now, Shelley's “a heart that had grown old, but had corrupted not,” comes into my mind; for he gathered wisdom but did not lose energy of soul. He was not only faithful to old ideals but open to new ones. He was always broad-minded, and he continued to mellow through life; but he kept his earnestness, and toleration never degenerated into indifference. He felt the evils and dangers of life keenly, and worked hard and at close quarters for many years against what he felt to be evil tendencies of thought and life amongst the young men he gathered in his Sunday classes: but he felt less and health of soul more keenly yet. His own tastes were varied. He loved his garden, he loved his friends, he loved travel, and he drew stores of knowledge, of power, and of pleasure from books. He relished life, and if he lived largely for others he did not discount the gift by seeming as if he could not live for himself. When he set out for two years' travel and residence on the Continent with his family he meant it to be at once a harvest and a seedtime, a time of present enjoyment and a storing up of knowledge and vital experiences for the future. Many men are wise enough to make something good out of the circumstances forced upon them: How few are wise enough to choose all the circumstances, in their uncontrolled discretion, enjoy every day of what they have chosen, and at the end be permanently enriched by well spent and happy years of combined fruition and preparation! His life was rich in blessings gratefully received, serenely enjoyed, and generously given."

After cremation at Chorlton the urn, with its ashes, was placed, after a memorial service at Monton Church, on Monday, in the family vault, in the churchyard adjoining. A large concourse of friends of Mr. Brooks of various communities gathered at Monton to testify to the honour in which his name and character are held. The service was conducted by the minister of Dean-row and Styal chapels, the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, who concluded his address with the following words:—"And some who have lived amongst us quiet, unassuming lives, placidly, conscientiously, strenuously faithful in their calling, and to their high calling in Christ Jesus, have seemed to us to have looked upon God's guidance much as the Jews are related to have regarded the guiding cloud in the wilderness. 'They fancy,' it is said, 'concerning the cloud that conducted Israel through the wilderness, that it did not only show them the way but also plane it; that it did not only lead them in the way which they must go, but also fit the way for them to go upon it.' So, I doubt not, in just as natural, divinely led, if also cloud-led way, such quiet faithful souls as we have known find death prepared for them, and they themselves serenely prepared for death, and find the words of the poet Sutton expressing but the simple, realised truth:—

'Just as any other friend's, they press Death's hand; and having died, feel none the less, How beautiful it is to be alive.'"

MR. J. D. DARBYSHIRE.

On Sunday week there died one of the oldest workers connected with the congregation at Stand. It is not often that any man holds the post of superintendent of a Sunday-school for so long a period as thirty-nine years. Mr. Darbyshire did this; and, until failing health compelled him to keep to his house, he was most regular in discharging his duties. He would have resigned, and in fact did so; but his fellow workers would not accept his resignation, being unwilling to break, even in appearance, the tie which for so long bound him to them. They asked and he consented to do so. Mr. Darbyshire was a Lancashire man, born at Belmont, near Rivington, in 1831. He had no connection with Stand until 1867, when, on the recommendation of Dr. Beard, he was appointed paid superintendent. Every Sunday he came out of Manchester, nearly six miles, having to walk most of the way. And when the office of superintendent was converted from a paid to a voluntary one, he still continued to come with the same unfailing regularity. He was a man of strong intellect, with a craving for knowledge, which he gratified by the help of a large library of his own collecting. He was always ready with help, encouragement, and sympathy for any whom he could influence. He was a stalwart teetotaler, and the Band of Hope which was founded soon after he came to Stand, by the then minister, Rev. W. C. Squier, owes a good deal of its present strength to his steady support. He was a fine example of the best type of Lancashire working man; and by the strength and integrity of his character he has left his mark deeply impressed upon the life of the community at Stand. He had a slight stroke some two years ago, and faded quietly away; his mind was clear till the last, and he loved to hear about Stand, and, still more, to see any of his friends from there. He and his family were members of the Strangeways congregation in Manchester, and doubtless much might be said of what he did there. But we at Stand felt that in a special sense he belonged to us, and now we have lost him. He was buried on Thursday afternoon, in the quiet and beautiful graveyard of the old chapel that he loved.

MRS. R. T. EADON.

It will be a grief to many who have known her bright personality, and perhaps shared her kind hospitality to know that Mrs. Robert Thomas Eadon, of Mandrake House, Sheffield, passed away in her 76th year last Thursday week. Her husband, who had been a prominent citizen of Sheffield, member of School Board, Alderman and Justice of Peace, and a leading member of the Upper Chapel congregation, had preceded her many years ago. Mrs. Eadon was to the last a devoted member of Upper Chapel, and almost her latest wish was to attend service there, even though she had not the physical strength for it. None could have been more regretfully missed from her usual place for the last few weeks than was she; for she was one of the most beloved members of the congregation. Staunch to the last, she found the greatest possible support and comfort in the Unitarian religion she loved. The new Mission Church at Attercliffe had her warm sympathy, and it is a happy memory now to think that she laid the corner-stone of the School-Church which was opened there last summer. The funeral took place last Saturday afternoon in the Sheffield General Cemetery, the service being conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL (MEETINGS, BOSTON, U.S.A.)

SIR.—Your readers will be interested to on behalf of the Boston Fund, the Treasurer has now received the sum of £565 and £243 in promises, making £808 in all. The Committee trust that before the end of January the total will reach at least £1,000. Preliminary steps will then be taken to allocate grants to a certain number of ministers.

May I also add that a circular giving information about the steamship arrangements, which are in charge of Messrs. Thos. Cook & Son, is now ready, and a copy will be forwarded to anyone sending a postcard to Essex Hall. It is to be hoped that many members of our Churches will accompany the ministers to America for the meetings next September.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

It was Christmas Day. The children had been to church with their father and mother. They had heard the beautiful old stories read, of the angels' song, the shepherds, and the star that hung above the place where the little child lay. They had joined in the Christmas carols; and now, whilst their mother went to see a sick friend, Nancy tucked her hand into her father's arm, and Arnold walked on the other side, on their way home. Nancy soon began to talk.

"I wish—oh, Father, I do wish we knew something about Jesus when he was a boy. We always hear of the little baby, and then nothing more till that time when he was twelve years old and went to the Temple. I do so want to know what he was like, and what he did. I wonder whether his mother wrote down little stories of what Jesus said and did, as Mother did about Arnold when he was little—such funny little tales! Do you think she did, Father?"

"No, Nancy, I am sure she did not; for one thing, writing was not so common then as it is now. I don't even know whether his mother could write; but in St. Luke's Gospel we are told, about some of the things that Jesus said, that 'Mary kept these sayings in her heart'—as many a mother has done with her children, and fathers, too, for that matter."

"I wonder," said Nancy, "what he was like when he was a little boy like Oliver—not a baby, you know, Father, nor twelve years old and big—but a little boy. I wonder whether he was merry and laughed, like Oliver, and was funny, too?"

"I am sure he did, Nancy. Little boys were in all times made to be merry and playful and happy. God would not have kept back happiness and childhood from Jesus when he gave it to others."

"And did he play games as we do, Father?" said Arnold. "Did they have cricket and football and such things?"

"I have no doubt he played games with his companions, with all the happiness of a real boy like the rest; but I do not know what their games were, amongst the Jewish boys. Whatever they played at, I am quite sure Jesus would be perfectly loyal to the rules of the game, and perfectly fair to his fellows."

"I wonder if he ever got cross or angry," said Nancy lightly.

"Oh, Nan!—how can you ask?" said Arnold. "He was quite good, he could never be tempted to be cross or angry."

"Never be tempted, Arnold?" said his father. "He was 'tempted in all points like as we are—but without sin.' Do you think that if he were never tempted, or tried, we should know whether he were good or not? What is it that makes you admire a person or think him 'good'? It is when you see him tempted to be cross, and keeping his temper; or to be dishonest, and being steady to his duty; or to deceive, and being strictly truthful; or to give way to fear, and being wholly courageous. Goodness is doing something, being active, not standing still and thinking yourself 'good' without any effort. The more strongly you feel the temptation to do wrong, the better you are if you resist it."

Arnold was very thoughtful and remained silent; and even Nancy did not speak for some time. Then she looked up, and said, "Then, Father, he must have been just the same that we children are! I had not thought of that."

"I think he was just the same as you in all sorts of temptations; but he was more faithful than any of us in resisting them; his whole heart was more bent to do right than ours are—though not more so than ours might be. No doubt, many a thing would come within his reach which he would have liked to do, but if his clear sight showed him that something else was better (at any rate, better just then), he would not hesitate for a moment as to which to do. And that, children, is just what we all might be—as clear-sighted and faithful as he; but because we choose what we like, and are tempted to do that rather than what in our secret hearts we know we ought to choose, we blind ourselves and become less and less able to see clearly, by yielding once, twice, and so on and on, to temptation. The thing we yield to may not be anything wrong in itself, but if there is a better, then it becomes wrong."

Nancy looked up at the sunny sky with a very thoughtful face, and Arnold gently kicked the stones from the path as he walked. No one spoke for time. Then Nancy sighed with a longing sigh, and "Oh, dear!" broke from her; but there was a hope and resolve in her face and in the words, as well as longing.

Then their father said, "I got a book the other day which has a nice title, 'Sunday Evenings with my Children,'* and I thought we might read some of it together on Sunday evenings. This is not Sunday, but if you like I will read you some of it to-day, as I found in it one of the stories which is about the very thing we have been talking about."

"Oh, yes, do, Father," they both said.

So in the afternoon they sat over the fire with their father and mother; and their father said, "This story is called 'Jesus at Play.'"

"How funny that you should have found in a book just what we wanted, Father!" said Nancy.

Then their father began, and read these parts of that story to them:

"I am afraid you are not prone to think of Jesus as joining in the interest of the playground. But how is it possible for any child to be a child of God, and yet think lightly of the joys of the boys and girls who made the young mountain streams to leap and laugh and then called them 'very good,' make boys and girls to do the same, and then send His son to stand aloof from them, as if they were very bad? How, too, could God send His son as a child possessed of all the powers of childhood, yet one of these powers, the power of fun, never to be used? No; the thing is impossible. Just because Jesus was a real holy child, and not a little imperfect attempt at one, he would not, he could not, despise the joys God had given to childhood. In the rapture and health of the playground, the unspeakable joy of its manifold games, he would see the gifts of the Giver of all good. I see him join heart and soul the throng of joyful children, loving the laughter of merry-hearted girls and the leaping impulses of strong-muscled boys. To keep a God-given power unused is no sign of a holy child; so we must think of Jesus as a real, thorough boy. To be a perfect boy you must be a real and thorough boy. Such must have been the boy Jesus, in whom God revealed His idea of what all boys ought to be.

"I do not happen to know the games of the young folks of Nazareth, but, of course, at first Jesus would not understand them, and had to learn their knack and laws, and to grow in the wisdom of the playground like the rest of the players. I fancy I see his bright, joyous face as he confesses that he does not know the game: Do not think that mere knowing is perfection; you may know—oh, I cannot tell you how much—and yet be wicked. A heart may be perfect towards God that yet has every thing to learn.

"I see him grasp the bat with which he is to play the ball, and the delight of his first try. So right-down thorough is his interest, so whole-hearted his effort, that he soon excels, and is picked for a side.

"He began his playground life as all boys have to begin. First, as one of the younger set, he had to put up with the small tyrannies of the older boys; and the inevitable 'putting-down' would, as usual, be a hard affair.

"Then slowly, and little by little, he grew into the older ranks, and took his place among the leaders. There, without one trace of tyranny, he always stood up for right and spoke up for truth. He became immensely popular, for brave and lovely deeds all people can admire."

"You know, children, that we are told that 'Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man,'" said their father.

"But Jesus never merely sought to be popular; the passion of his heart was to be and do the right and good. But do not think that in this he found no difficulty. One of the very hardest of places in the world for a right-thinking boy to be all he wants to be is among the excitements of a playground shared by hasty, thoughtless companions. That is a battlefield where goodness, however bright and joyous, must watch and struggle, perhaps suffer pain and doubt.

"Fancy that you can see Jesus one of a cluster of companions, while a bitter strife of 'sides' is raging, with loud and angry 'you're a story-teller, I'm not,' where faces are pale and fists are clenched. His character for fairness singles Jesus out to the leader of the side opposed to his own to appeal to. 'He shall settle it,' he cries. 'What does Jesus say?' and he strikes out in the crowd to clear a way for him. 'We'll leave it to him,' the excited boy continues, 'and he's one of your own side.' Some of his own side loudly object to his settling the dispute; they do not want to be 'out'; and they know they ought to be, and that Jesus will say so. He has gone through it all before, but he speaks up for truth. 'We are out, I am sure we are,' he answers; and up go the caps of the other side, and with noisy shouts they move off to 'go in'; and some low-minded boy of his own side threatens and bullies him, till something like tears come into his eyes; for though he is above doing wrong he is not above feeling sorrow. But he does not retaliate; he walks quietly away, stung, not by the sneer, but by his companion's want of uprightness.

"So he learnt, even on the playground, deep lessons of obedience to God. The grand spirit of loyalty to right and God in which he passed through life right on to Calvary, was the self-same as that in which he shared the games of the girls and boys playing about the streets of Nazareth.

"And though a boy who dies a boy has no other chance on earth of serving God than in his days of school and games, he has had chance enough; for there, just as well as anywhere else, he may be a good and brave follower of Jesus."

A little silence followed. Then Arnold said, "Thank you, Father; is that all?"

"Yes, that is all of that story."

"I do like that book," said Nancy, "at least, when you read it to us. Will you read some more now, Father?"

"No, not any more of this now, Nancy: But here is one thing more—a poem which I should like you to learn by heart, and I wish every British child might learn it, so as never to forget it. It is by Rudyard Kipling, and is at the end of 'Puck of Pook's Hill.'"

The two children took the poem and learnt it, and I hope you, dear children, will all do the same, and will learn to live in its spirit, as Arnold and Nancy tried to do.

THE CHILDREN'S SONG:

Land of our Birth, we pledge to thee
Our love and toil in the years to be;
When we are grown, and take our place,
As men and women with our race.

Father in Heaven, who lovest all,
Oh, help Thy children when they call;
That they may build from age to age
An undefiled heritage.

Teach us to bear the yoke in youth,
With steadfastness and careful truth;
That, in our time, Thy grace may give
The Truth whereby the Nations live:

Teach us to rule ourselves away,
Controlled and cleanly night and day;
That we may bring, if need arise,
No maimed or worthless sacrifice:

Teach us to look, in all our ends,
~~On Thee for aid, and not our friends~~
By fear or favour of the crowd.

Teach us the strength that cannot seek
By deed or thought to hurt the weak;
That, under Thee, we may possess
Man's strength to comfort man's distress:

Teach us Delight in simple things,
And Mirth that has no bitter springs;
Forgiveness free of evil done,
And Love to all men 'neath the sun!

Land of our Birth, our faith, our pride,
For whose dear sake our Fathers died;
O Motherland, we pledge to thee
Head, heart, and hand through the years to be!

PEACE AND GOOD WILL.

THE spirit of Christmas finds, may we not say, through the ready kindness of our friends, an ample measure of expression in this number of the INQUIRER. The brightness of it, in a world made beautiful by love, the glow of the hearth, the happy sense of comradeship, the children's eager delight, these bring a constantly recurring impulse of more earnest purpose to make that spirit prevail, to overcome the evil, the falseness, the cruelty, the hardness of heart, the untamed passions, not yet yoked with truth and brotherly love for generous service of the common good.

"Peace Sunday" comes to us again, and happily not this year to find us mourning on the blood-stained field of battle, or shamed by the barbarous exultation of a delirious people—and yet with other fields of strife still unpacified, and the conflict with cruel wrongs still demanding all wisdom, and every atom of strength, and the energy of undaunted faith. Social Service, that is the true watchword for the people of this land, with steadfast determination to maintain the national honour, in justice, compassion, and an effectual humanity. Lurid scenes in Russia and the Congo infamy may warn us of the depths of the moral tragedy by which human nature even in these days may be faced, and with no danger of a contemptible self-righteousness, may set us with a new seriousness of the work of progress for self-sacrifice and national uplifting.

The Christmas festival brings a time of resting and delight, but not idle or purposeless for those who receive its richest blessing. A truce of God, a testimony to the abiding things of the better life, it is for the cleansing and renewal of hearts dedicated to the highest service.

There is an idea abroad among moral people that they should make their neighbours good. One person I have to make good: myself. But my duty to my neighbour is much more nearly expressed by saying that I have to make him happy—if I may.—R. L. Stevenson's Christmas Sermon.

ADVENT ADDRESSES.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

V.—THE CHRISTIAN.

* "The Gospel of God . . . concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of Holiness."

Rom. i. 1, 3, 4.

TO-DAY I bring to a close these Advent Addresses on the relation of Early Christianity to the leading religions with which it came into contact. Setting aside more remote peoples, such as the Persian, Babylonian, and Egyptian, I have endeavoured to give a general idea of the impression made by the Gospel respectively on the Greek, the Roman, the Barbarian, and the Jew, and also of the impression produced by each of these in turn on the Gospel. The relationship, of course, was one of "give and take," and though the influence exerted by the higher was ever the stronger, Christianity received elements from the inferior beliefs which at any rate modified its form and complexion, if they cannot be said to have very seriously affected its essential spirit. Christianity did not wear quite the same garb in Jerusalem as in Galilee, nor on Mars Hill as on Mount Zion, nor at Rome as at Athens. In these different localities, as in later times in Gaul and Britain and among the English, it assumed an outward aspect in sympathy with its surroundings. Nevertheless, in all countries and periods the Gospel at heart has been very much the same; and I want now to point out some of its more permanent and distinctive features. We have seen the Christian face to face with the Greek philosopher, with the Roman Stoic, with the childlike and credulous Gentile, with the proud and nobly gifted Hebrew. From the successive pictures we may perhaps have gathered traits common to it always, and be able to define what the Christian was.

Now, the name "Christian" is a very rare one in the New Testament. It only occurs three times. We do not find it in any of the writings attributed to St. John or St. Paul. It appears twice in the Book of Acts—in the passage which informs us that "the disciples" were first called Christians at Antioch, and in the speech of Agrippa to the effect that St. Paul had almost persuaded him to be a Christian. The third occasion is in the first of the letters doubtfully ascribed to St. Peter, from which we learn that the name was rather than adopted by the Christians themselves. The expressions in use among the members of the primitive Church to denote their fellowship were various and significant. They spoke of one another as "disciples" or as "saints," or as "brethren," nothing more. Evidently they cared for something much more than their name. They thought of themselves as "disciples" of the same Master, or as "saints," in its early sense of men consecrated to the new and uncorrupted life of their Master, or as "brethren" bound together in a common cause, and face to face with similar difficulties, dangers, and enemies. Then by these enemies they were nicknamed "Christians," and they accepted the designation. Whatever objection may have been felt with regard to it was soon overcome. No name could be broader, more honourable, or more happy. It centred not in a doctrine or ecclesiastical condition, but in a person: That person was Christ.

The word is most suggestive. It gives us an idea of the earliest statement of belief in vogue among the "brethren," and of its extreme simplicity compared with the elaborate creeds of a later age. A Christian was apparently one who believed in Jesus Christ, that is, in Jesus as the Christ, or Messiah. To the Jews this meant the blasphemous doctrine that Jesus of Nazareth, the son of a carpenter, who died among felons, was the long-promised heaven-sent deliverer of their oppressed nation. To others than Jews it meant that Jesus was "Lord" or "Master," the ideal and perfect life for humanity, the "Son of God." All these terms: "Jesus Christ," "our Lord," "the Son of God," are frequent in the New Testament, and they are practically interchangeable. Whatever differences of meaning they may have originally possessed, they denote much the same on the lips of the several Apostles and leaders of the Gospel. Peter said to Jesus himself at Cæsarea Philippi, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The Ethiopian baptized by Philip, when requested to give evidence of his faith, replied, "I believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God." John declared that he who "believed in the Son had everlasting life," and that "whosoever confessed that Jesus was the Son of God, God dwelt in him and he in God." And Paul, at the beginning of his famous letter to the church at Rome, speaks of the "Gospel of God concerning His Son, Jesus the Christ our Lord, who was of the seed of David according to the flesh, and the Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness."

What, briefly, do we learn from such impassioned language? What was it that Peter, Philip, John, and Paul one and all were so enthusiastic about, so eager that the world should hear and feel and understand? Unquestionably it was the personality of Jesus, the mind and influence of their Master. The essence of their Christianity, at any rate, was not merely a changed theology, a changed conception of God's dealings with men—though, indeed, there was this—but a deep, devoted admiration and love for the character of Jesus. In fact, for them Christianity and Christ were almost one. Without the latter, the former lost nine-tenths of its meaning and value. The new theology, philosophy, or conception would not have been there if Jesus himself had not first lived and gone about doing good, and gained the unbounded reverence and affection of his followers. Preceding and embodying the changed point of view was the unique, unaccountable, magnificent spiritual genius of the teacher. He was worthy to be "Lord," "Messiah," "Son of God" ere men could call him so; Interpret the fact as men may, the fact itself is the principal thing. Given Jesus, the doctrine follows. Belief in him as a character, an ideal, a quickening and infectious spirit of love and holiness is the starting-point of the various beliefs about him, whether, as the Son of God or God Himself, or as both. The simple theology and the intricate, the ideas of St. John and of St. Paul, the speculations that resulted in making him at last the second person of the Trinity, had their root in the surpassing greatness and beauty of the man.

We see this in the way in which the personality of Jesus overpowered and transformed the previous idea of the Messiah. The early Christians were under a great difficulty to prove that Jesus fulfilled the national expectations. To commend him to the Jews they did their best to support his claim by appeal to the Old Testament. It was an almost impossible task. Outside of Isaiah they had little or nothing to warrant the belief that the national Deliverer would be a poor man and a layman, done to death between two thieves. All recent Jewish writings prophesied an entirely different personage. But, borne up and carried along by their love for Jesus, they so interpreted and manipulated Scripture as to bring it into accord with his story and his fate; and they so far succeeded that they secured for him for all time the title of Jesus Christ.

The same is true of that far loftier epithet "Son of God." Greeks, Romans, and Barbarians understood this term more readily than the Jewish name "Christ." It was, therefore, more universal in its appeal; and though it led to some strange orthodox conclusions, it also inspired the deepest theological thought that the world has known. "Son of God" was not an uncommon title among the peoples of antiquity for a man of exceptional gifts or exceptional position in the world. But the Christians had in mind exceptional moral and spiritual powers. Jesus was Son of God—the Son of God—in virtue of his easy supremacy in love and righteousness and redeeming influence. Compared with other men, he was as an "only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth,"—the delight, the apple of His eye, in closest union with Him, the sharer of His confidence, of His secret will and purpose, of His merciful and sacred nature.

Throughout the Gospels we get this impression of spiritual persuasiveness and authority. "Rabbi," Master, was the word nearly everywhere applied to him. At Nazareth, when his jealous and infuriated townsmen sought to cast him down the face of the hill, he simply turned upon them and passed through them and went his way. He was not as the Scribes, it was said, but ~~with commanding force and~~ ^{with commanding force and} ~~authority~~ ^{authority}. Men were astonished at his teaching. They asked, in amazement, "Can this be the son of Joseph?" He set his word on a level with that of Moses, did what seemed to him right on the Sabbath in defiance of tradition, declared that one greater than Jonah or Solomon addressed them, and that the least of his disciples was greater than John the Baptist; invited the weary and heavy-laden to come to him for refreshment, bade him take up his yoke and follow him, said to sinful, repentant souls, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," called men in summary fashion to leave all their previous life, and was obeyed. What was the meaning of it all? Spiritual magnetism? Probably so, if you intend by that the strength and potency of the God-consciousness. He was full of God's Spirit, lived and moved and had his being in God, and was to Godless and God-forsaken men an impostor, but to those who had known anything of the superhuman in the soul, of the more than man that might enter into our human nature, was the Godlike Mind, the Son of God.

Convincing proof of the total absence in him of the idle vanity of the visionary, was his human modesty, the sense of his human limitations. He would not suffer himself to be called good. His word was not his own, but God's. Of himself he could do nothing. It was not for him to say when the last day would come, or for him to dispense places of honour round the throne. He was no judge or divider over men. He prayed in Gethsemane that the cup might pass from him—he trembled for a moment at the pain of death. On the cross he allowed an impression of his solitariness and abandonment to escape his dying lips. And is not this mingling of the divine with the human, of majesty with lowliness, just the twofold temper of felt sonship to God?

But, it may be asked, are you not speaking of divinity in the sense in which others besides Christ may be said to be, to some extent, divine? Certainly. That, to me, is the divinity, and the only divinity, that Christ had, or with which in connection with him we need concern ourselves. Any other kind, entirely unknown to us because totally unshared by us, we could not recognise in him. We should not have in us the key whereby to unlock the casket of his mystery. Jesus is the Son of God in our eyes because, and only because, we have the potentiality, at any rate, of the same divine relationship. I do not for an instant say that we could be a Jesus, any more than I would say that we could be a Shakespeare. That would be a conceited and senseless infatuation. Let us concede once and for all, as we are sane and sober men, that his superhuman consciousness and royal humility could never find a dwelling in our imperfect, undeveloped souls. Nevertheless, in so far as we have sufficient of Shakespeare in us to enable us to admire and love his art, so we have just that amount of divinity in our nature and character which constrains us to look up to Christ as the Child of God.

His message, he declares, is "a gospel of God concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness." That is, as a man, as a Hebrew, Jesus was of the race and family of David; but because of the spirit of holiness in his heart and in all he did he was the Son of God. From such a statement it is an obvious deduction that wherever there is the spirit of holiness there is something of Sonship to God. And St. Paul undoubtedly believed and preached this. He said to men into whose natures the spirit of holiness had but recently entered, "Because ye are Sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of His Son into your hearts." And again: "You hath He conformed to the image of His Son, that he (Jesus) might be the firstborn among many brethren." And again: "As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the Sons of God." Hence to St. Paul the end and object of creation was the "manifestation of the Sons of God," the coming forth into the world of men filled with the spirit of holiness. And part of the same truth is expressed in the Apostle's great saying that his converts had received the spirit of sonship whereby they cried Abba, Father. "The Spirit," he says, the Spirit of Holiness, the Holy Spirit—"itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him that we may be glorified together": provided, that is, we prove our sonship by undergoing hardships and privations for our fellow men.

St. Paul spoke feelingly, because he owed his own conversion and change of thought and life to Jesus. Under the gentle, constraining influence of Christ's love he himself had "emerged from the dark night of bigotry, which had filled his mind with delusions and his heart with hatred, into a breadth of view, a clearness of faith, and a self-devotion to the good of man, which," as Dr. Drummond says, "to this day the world does not understand." Hence he could speak of Jesus as "Lord" and "Son of God"—a ruler to him who reigned not by right of office but by right of holiness, the most lordly because the most self-sacrificing, and a Son of God in his eyes because through him the spirit of sonship had been awakened in his mind and he had found the Father.

The evidence of the other disciples would have been similar if we could have had it. What a poor, faulty humanity they presented at first, ignorant, quarrelsome, self-seeking men! Yet what a brave, noble company Jesus made of them! The change in Peter, for example, was amazing. Again and again he irritated, vexed, and enraged his Master. None but Jesus could have endured him so long. Yet in the end Peter became the "rock" of the Church. Jesus did, indeed, teach him to walk on the sea.

What, then, is it to be a Christian? What but to believe in Christ? Are you Christians, my Friends? Do you believe in Christ? What is it to believe? Saint Resartus once exclaimed, "Carlyle is my religion!" Can you say in that spirit "Christ is my religion"? Do you believe in Christ even as some of you believe in Gladstone or in Mr. Chamberlain—not merely in the opinions or the policy, but in the motive, the leadership, in the Man? So we come round again to Personality, and to the limitless contents and consequences of belief in the personality of Christ. To believe in him is to believe in his life as the best life, the truest life, the only life. Having seen and tasted that, you can never be entirely satisfied with anything less. Faith in Jesus is faith in righteousness, not in force; in liberty, not in ascendancy; in truth, and not merely in that part of it which will be acceptable; in forgiveness, not in revenge; in forgetfulness of injuries, not in cherishing the thought of them. Confidence in him is confidence in your fellow man, confidence in doing good, confidence in patience and perseverance in good works. And, lastly, to have faith in Christ is to be gradually changed into his likeness: You cannot love anyone without becoming in some degree as he is; and if your belief in Christ is sufficiently deep and permanent you cannot help being made more like him. He will give of his life to you, will quicken you, will help you to see and to feel, will communicate to you the power to labour and endure and conquer. He will do with you, in some degree, what he did with the apostles—with Peter and John and Paul. Think, again, what they were when they began to believe in him, and then consider what they were when they had believed in him for ten and twenty years! He redeemed them. And he can redeem you. His fearlessness will make you fearless, his purity will make you pure. His power over the demons of darkness and wickedness will enable you to tread down evil under your feet. Things that seem impossible will become possible. The boundaries of your spiritual life will widen as the domain of your physical knowledge may widen under the influence of a Newton or a Darwin. The vast world of righteousness will open its doors and let you in, a new and enchanting universe, where to love and to worship are as natural as the food you eat or the air you breathe.

THE NATIVITY SONG.

BY THE REV. ALFRED THOMPSON.

A STORY of old Russia tells how some sailors of Novgorod brought ashore from a wrecked vessel a cannon. This cannon was melted down, cast into the form of a bell, and sent far away beyond the Volga to a village situated in a dim forest, and was there mounted in the belfry of a monastery and christened Jeanne. There for a hundred years she called the simple villagers to the great church festivals, at which times her sonorous peal would ring out a welcome to the traveller belated in the vast surrounding solitudes. Then, when the Swedes beat Peter the Great at Narva, came a message to the monastery to deliver up the bell for the Imperial ordnance. ~~For the Tsar, ready for patriotic sacri-~~ the bell from the belfry; though, since they must part with their beloved Jeanne, nothing would satisfy them but that they themselves should throw Jeanne into the melting-pot. So they recast her into a cannon of correct calibre, and re-christened her Vigilant. Then the abbot, committing her to the care of two of the brethren who had once been men of arms, bade them never leave her, nor fail to bring her back when the war was over. So the two monks, now gunners, went forth with their precious charge. Years went by, but no news came to the monastery. But at length, by the help of God and the Tsar, the brethren came again, bringing with them the gun, heroine of many a fierce fight, and, attached to her, a pennant inscribed by Tsar Peter himself: "Ring, Jeanne the Vigilant, sing the victory of Poltava!" So, for a second time Jeanne was transformed, and from the task of thundering vengeance and war, passed to the more congenial occupation of pealing forth pardon and peace.

Thus it was that one Christmas Eve some travellers through the deep snow heard the bell—a phantom bell, they thought, so wild and lonely was the spot, so far, apparently, from human habitation. But in the morning, ere the sun was up, the bell rang out again. Guided by the direction of the sound, the travellers marched through the forest till the monastery hove in sight. Happy morning! "Christ is born. . . . Christ is born from highest heaven." Sweet voices greeted them: And that glad morning wore on to a joyous day, crowned by a festive night, by the Yule log, Christmas candles, and the glowing faces and overflowing hospitality of the good monks.

So for us to-day Christmas has yet something of the unexpected, does not wholly lose the charms of surprise and wonder it had for us as children. "The time draws near the birth of Christ." It breaks upon us again with what melody of heavenly music! "Men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks." They do so once a year at least. Though brief, it is a truce, an amnesty. Just now it is for the bell, not for the bugle, we listen. It is a time for re-casting our cannon. It is a time for remembering that if Christianity has a militant, it has also a pacific aspect; that even more important than the conflict to be waged is the brotherhood to be cultivated. It is a time when Christendom is for once unanimous, men agreeing by universal consent that this is no season for polemics, but for peace.

Hark! "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill toward men." That, history? Duncie! Know you not that the seer and the poet outsoar the historian as the stars outsoar the eagle? Inasmuch as the evangelist heralds his birth by an angelic chorus, be assured this is no common mortal. Cold criticism evaporates before the blaze of the Yule log. Save us that vision of angels and that Nativity Song! Angels? Why not? Sits the Eternal apart, lonely and forlorn? Or sees blind Milton what to seeing men is oft obscure—

"Thousands at His bidding speed,

Modern thought points to the existence of higher intelligences, to the extreme improbability that man is the highest in the scale. The advent of every hero is portentous, and the unity of the universe, the kinship of all minds, proscribes the idea that interest in that advent can be confined to earth. East and west inspired sages have divined this grand truth, though they may have presented it in language of exaggerated realism. Thus, it was claimed that, when Lord Buddha was born, "earth put forth a thousand sudden flowers," angels magnificently arrayed descended to earth on yellow horses, and "gods walked free with men that day." Yes, the seers of the ages—rare souls—have perceived an essential sympathy between all parts of the creation: A planet cannot spring forth on its mission, but the morning stars must sing together, and all the sons of God shout for joy. A hero cannot come to earth, but the music here is caught up into the grand symphony of heaven. Of the myriads of vibrations in nature the most sensitive of human beings feel but a few, the dullest how few? But, if science speaks correctly, were our auditory nerves strung to the requisite pitch, the movement of thousands of grass blades through the soil would affect us as the clank of an advancing army, the unfolding of a thousand flower petals would startle us as the roll of thunder clouds. May not, then, a cultivated spiritual sense perceive the vision and hear the song which by a frigid rationalism are neither seen nor heard? We need to put a large interpretation on the pronouncement that Messiah came to open blind eyes and unstop deaf ears.

"Unto us a child is born: unto us a son is given." Birth is always a wonder: the birth of a little child, and especially of a firstborn, the most wonderful of all wonders; Anticipated with mingled joy and anguish, the anguish is no more remembered when it comes into the world. A moment ago this child was not; now it is. Out of non-existence it has come into existence. Where before there were but two voices there is now a third. "And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger." It is not surprising that this story of the Nativity has captivated the imagination of Christendom, that it has been the theme of poets, painters, and musicians, and that the simplicity and sweetness of it have fascinated mankind. When listening to Handel's "Messiah," thoughts of historical accuracy are far from us, for we are enthralled by some sublime, elusive, spiritual truth, and God and humanity, goodness and love are very, very near. Nativity, maternity; maternity, nativity. Birth, the mother of life; life the mother of birth. The eternal cycle, perennially beautiful. So Jesus, knowing the power of this theme, threw the whole of his Gospel into the spiritual parable, "Ye must be born again." And we keep the Christmas Festival well if graces all but dead in us are born again, if the dying embers of generosity and magnanimity are fanned into life. Goodwill must be more than a phrase, more than a dole which we shall not miss; it must be a renaissance of altruistic activities, manifested in prayer for man's improvement, man's redemption—a good-will which works as well as wishes.

But the climax of this Nativity Song is "Peace on earth." Peace, not a sword: Nothing in the career of Christ is quite as reassuring as that profound, unruffled calm which characterised him from the cradle to the cross, that peace—deep, silent, strong, which sustained him in the darkest hours. And so dearly did he prize that peace that he left it as his best legacy to his followers. Well has it been described as a peace which passeth all understanding: Words cannot touch its heights nor sound its depths. Yet who that has sought the Divine life has not had fugitive feelings of its vivifying and composing presence? We feel it when we pass from sultry summer sunshine to the hallowed coolness of some cathedral aisle; we feel it when we wander by the seashore when the ebb tide and the flood tide meet with a scarcely audible kiss; we feel it when upon some hill top we stand with nothing between us and the stars; we feel it in the falling of the night with its subduing hush upon a weary world; we feel it when in some moment of reciprocated sympathy we silently press the hand of a dear friend; we feel it when holy memories of angel faces float before us from the past; we feel it when the thought is borne in on us that, spite of the groans and cries of this sorrowing world, a wisdom unbounded and a love inexhaustible are directing all things towards a glorious goal; but at no time are we in a better mood to feel the inflooding of this peace than when Christmas chimes call us out of our selfishness to the imitation of the holy child Jesus, and bid us awake to our share in the fulfilment of his mission—

"For lo! the days are hastening on

By prophet-bards foretold,
When, with the ever-circling years,
Comes round the age of gold;
When peace shall over all the earth
Her ancient splendours fling,
And the whole world send back the song
Which now the angels sing."

FIRE WORSHIP.

In summer we may be more particularly sun-worshippers, but in winter we are fire-worshippers. We do not forget nor despise the treasures of the snow, ice, and frost, hail and stormy winds, but there is, after all, a grey and gloomy aspect about these things that drives us home to the cheerful blazing fire, and makes us, in spite of ourselves, as inveterate fire-worshippers as any Parsee, Zoroastrian, or earliest ancestor to whom Prometheus brought the bright red thing from heaven in a reed. Early man's devotion to fire for its multitudinous blessings has passed on to the latest child of earth. Not the least of these blessings is its power of drawing men closer together in the most unconstrained converse and intercourse. Of this special social blessing Lowell thus sings:

"What warm protection dost thou bend
Round curtained talk of friend with friend,
While the grey snow-storm, held aloof,
To softest outline rounds the roof,
Or the rude North, with baffled strain
Shoulders the frost-starred window-pane!

Meanwhile thou meldest every word.

A sweetly unobtrusive thing;
For thou hast magic beyond wine,
To unlock natures each to each;
The unspoken thought thou canst divine;
Thou fillest the pauses of the speech
With whispers that to dreamland reach,
And frozen fancy-springs unchain
In Arctic outskirts of the brain;
Sun of all inmost confidences!"

Yes, this "Winter Evening Hymn to My Fire," as Lowell calls the fine poem from which these few lines are taken, is linked in all essentials with those most ancient of ancient hymns, the Vedic hymns; the first word of the first Vedic hymn being the name of the god of fire, Agni, a god whose name has come down to us in the Latin ignis, and who still ignites the fires upon our English hearths. All through the ages we find how persistently the human race are fire-worshippers: The classical religions bring prominently into view the special deities of fire. Among the Greeks Hephaistos (Vulcan) blazed, and the virgin goddess Hestia, i.e., divine hearth, shone and cheered, and she was worshipped by the Romans under the name of Vesta, whose sacred fire was tended incessantly in her temple in the Forum by the Vestal Virgins. When we remember these things, and our own latent Zoroastrianism, one feels too fraternal to feel oneself very superior to the barbarians. We are rather inclined to smile than condemn, knowing in what case we ourselves are, when we read the grave remarks that "the real and absolute worship of fire exists in two forms, the first belonging to fetichism, and the second to Polytheism: In the former the rude barbarian adores the actual flame as if it was the highest object he could adore; in the latter he regards any individual fire as a manifestation of one great elemental being the fire god!" Surely this is a glass in which we almost see ourselves! Herodotus, more than two thousand years ago, recorded that the Persians "thought fire to be a god," and it is said that their latest descendants in India, the Parsees, "actually address it in supplication, as if it were sentient, intelligent, divine and omnipresent, and ready to hear, bless, assist, and deliver." Well, it would be difficult, perhaps, to analyse our relationship to fire, and to separate our direct attachment to it for itself, and for all its boons and blessings from a more fundamental religious element. But, after all, the genuine unsophisticated delight in any natural thing is elemental religion, and no grown-up person is over-anxious that children should too suddenly or too seriously turn from their delight in things (in gifts and toys) to the givers. The sweetest thanks, after all, are children's, or men's, undisguised manifestations of delight in anything. There is always time enough and to spare for the heart to turn in staid moments of meditation to thank the givers: it is a maturer thing, and signifies a deeper relationship, but need never supersede the childlike impulse of joy. A jubilant barbarian, for whom each yellow dancing flame is a god or goddess ("elfish daughter of Apollo") is a more helpful brother, religiously regarded, than a morose Christian, in whom the winter's fire awakes no jubilation of any kind. It is a good thing never to let that jubilant world childhood, as it were, coming back to us and reminding us how much we may lose, if we lose the simple gratitude of that ancient childhood, if we lose the sense that Nature is ours, even as a child feels that he possesses father, mother, and the whole house, and most other people and their houses, too. Wordsworth expressed the loss of that sense of possessing Nature in that noble sonnet beginning:

"The world is too much with us, late and soon,
Getting and spending we lay waste our powers,
Little we see in Nature that is ours:
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!"

And then he, too, sees the advantage the Pagan or the Barbarian has over us.

"Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;

Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

One of the quaintest, and in its way most touching, of Nathaniel Hawthorne's sketches is the one he entitles "Fire-Worship." He is entering a savage protest against the introduction of the stove, in place of the open fire, into houses. The stove seems to have brought in Fire-Worship by revolt in some quarters in America. And I confess I sympathise with Hawthorne, for the unhappiest winter I ever spent was in a German house with a ghostly white-tiled stove in the corner of the room, and never a glimpse of our ancestral god Agni to be seen from one month's end to the other. Hawthorne launches a humorously awful indictment against "the cheerless and ungenial stove."

"Where is that brilliant guest," he cries, "that quick and subtle spirit whom Prometheus lured from heaven to civilise mankind and cheer them in their wintry desolation—that comfortable inmate, whose smile during eight months of the year was our sufficient consolation for summer's lingering advance and early flight? Alas! blindly inhospitable, grudging the food that kept him cheery and mercurial, we have thrust him into an iron prison, and compel him to smoulder away his life on a daily pittance which once would have been too scanty for his breakfast. . . . I shall never be reconciled to this enormity."

And finally he makes one last desperate appeal against the stove in the name of patriotism. "In classic times the exhortation to fight 'pro aris et focis,' for the altars and the hearths, was considered the strongest appeal that could be made to patriotism. Wisely were the altar and hearth conjoined in one mighty sentence, for the hearth, too, had its kindred sanctity. Religion sat down beside it, not in the priestly robes which decorated and perhaps disguised her at the altar, but arrayed in simple matron's garb, and uttering her lessons with the tenderness of a mother's voice and heart. . . . It has been our task to uproot the hearth. What further reform is left for our children to achieve, unless they overthrow the altar too? And by what ~~means~~ ^{means} shall we attempt to rouse up native valour? Fight for your hearths? There will be none throughout the land. Fight for your stoves! Not I, in faith. If in such a cause I strike a blow, it shall be on the invader's part; and Heaven grant that it may shatter the abomination all to pieces!"

Well, we here in England are not likely to write on behalf of our hearths. Perhaps, indeed, our Fire-Worship is carried to an extreme, and while we gather around the fire on the hearth, we are apt a little to forget that other fire on the altar. Yet never is the hearth so much enjoyed as when we have been drawn away from it, for a time, by services for that other fire. After all, never does its secret and exquisite comfort and inspiration affect us so much as after the little adventures away from it—the drenching rain, the biting frost, the driving snow, the gusty wind and some little duties to perform out of doors with a spice of irksomeness in them, these things are the most fitting preliminaries to genuine Fire-Worship. And then, as we warm our limbs, we warm our hearts, too. At such times our minds turn lightly to thoughts of kindness. We think of the poor, the sad, the sinful, the children, the birds, the animals. Let not good thoughts, benevolent thoughts, that will flash up in your mind as the flames flash up on your hearth, by laws as natural or as supernatural as they, let them not all die down without accomplishing the thing whereunto they were sent to you. Your fire will burn more brightly (sevenfold more brightly, says the prophet) and warm you more as you will have helped it on by the warmth and brightness from your own heart. May givers and receivers alike learn more deeply “to glorify the Lord for His fires”—on the altar and on the hearth.

IN CONVIVIO.

CHRISTMAS is a time for fellowship that knows no social grades, for blunt, open, honest camaraderie. For Christ's sake, I would remember all the year that I have the poor with me, insistent presences, that there is a poor old woman round the corner who never begs but ever needs my bounty; but once a year, for his sake, who did bite and sup with both publican and sinner, spurning not the rich man's table, nor despising the proffered meal of the poor, I would be reminded that I can be with mankind, with men of all sorts and conditions, better, chiefly better, and worse than myself, my equals.

Now, all of you come in out of the cold. Sit, fellows, where ye will. Sit, and take meat and drink for strength and gladness of body and heart, and, as our feast goes forward, let who can—even as ye come singing—give us snatches of quaint old song for our better merriment. For being pagan in this wise we shall not be less Christian.

I will your mirth, a pagan joy.

“I tell you true

Christmas bringeth unto you

Only mirth.”

Or it should bring, I reflect: Time was, when far-distant friends did wish me “A Merry Christmas,” a thing that could men; but, sobered and made sad by a thousand ills of life, or one, they nowadays wish me only “A Happy Christmas,” a thing that confines and contracts itself in the heart, a very personal, selfish thing. Whence comes this vast modification of friendly desire? Is it because once, in the full gaiety of joy, I did drink deeply and eat substantially, both splendidly, and so gave their chaster souls the idea that the merriment of man's heart was but a taint of original sin; or that they, for brooding too heavily over the miseries of the world, have set bounds to human blessedness and cast outside as unholy all men and things that are merry? Whatever 'tis, 'tis pitiful, for mere happiness is but the pale good we mortals nervously seek, but merriment, the soul's hilariousness, mirth, is what the gods, for our surprising good, throw carelessly into our laps. Your carols, fellows! Happiness is too placid to love them; has not a throat lusty enough to troll them; only our hearts bursting with the wild laughter of mirth can sweep their joys into human ears and souls.

Ay, be ye pagan in this wise, and ye shall be better Christian. For let me tell you more. It is not the death of our Christ we celebrate: so be not sad. Nor is it his birth, although of it we will sing often before we part, and be scattered over earth again: so be not over pensive. Christ is born, 'tis true; but none of us understand the meaning of the truth, else did we not quarrel so much over what we think it. What we do celebrate is the good spirit of mankind, that which dwells in every man's heart of heart, the spirit which tells us even more surely than Christianity that we are brothers. Nay, Christianity, as we have had it, and as we have it in multitudinous segments, has told men they were enemies, enemies of themselves, enemies of their kind, enemies of God. And the declaration mankind has well known to be the untruth of an overstatement, an exaggeration, a fallacy. Brothers, the true Christ-child we reverence at this season is the good within our hearts, and it is no less than God.

Now, having preached to you paganism and religion, the essence of both, let me give you a little theology. Ye have heard it said that Christ is the incarnation of God. Ye have not believed it; but I could impart some truth of it. Let it pass. I have a greater truth, for it is that which all ye—and some of you will not to call yourselves Christian—believe. It is that Christ is the incarnation of mankind—ye have made him the perfect embodiment of your good spirit. Ye say not that Christ is the perfect man, but ye do say that the perfect man is Christ. Into his life ye have cast all your sorrows, and there they have been reflected, as in a mirror for you to see again, and intensified; your many stripes, wherewith the world did afflict you, ye have laid upon him, and see the wounds in healing; and ye have given him of your joys for the making of blessedness. Ye have laid your souls upon him, making him Lord. Ye have seen yourselves in him, your better selves, your perfect selves—the deep good of your hearts that is ever a sorrow and a gladness—so have ye seen a man of sorrows and a bearer of sorrows, in Christ, a Saviour.

Brothers, this is not the time for exposition. But think on't. Warm your hearts together now, know mirth, be like men whose only care is the carelessness of good hearts, then, as ye go out hence, go forth to tell the good of man, to preach the love of man, and God shall bless you all.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

Ask me not how it should be so—enough that so it is; duty done, even with tears and shedding of blood, carries its own reward with it, and is attended always by a peace which is not only happiness, but something deeper and more abiding.—Charles Beard.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

It is time to send our Christmas greetings. According to the calendar, indeed, Christmas will not be here for ten days yet; but what does that matter? We feel as Christmassy as Santa Claus, the logs crackle gaily in our stoves, and we look out through thick falling snow over snowy plains towards the veiled snow mountains, fringed with forests of Christmas trees. Our Christmas sports are not, as in some degenerate lands, football without and bridge within, but tobogganing, skating, ski-running, bob-sleighting, Snöre Kjöring (which means ski-running behind a horse), and all sorts of romps in the snow. We speak Latin in the Crow's Nest; not exactly the Latin of Cicero—I don't believe anybody ever did speak that sort of Latin except Cicero, and even he only when he was togatus; had his tail-coat on, so to say—but a language not very different from that which Balbus spoke, when he was building a wall at Chur. Ladin, we call it; and, together with its cousins in the Rhine Oberland, the Julier Pass, and on the banks of the Albula and Lower Inn, it is also called Romantsch. Our word for Christmas is Nadel, and for New Year Bümaun. Shall I tell you how we intend to celebrate Nadel and Bümaun in Cresta and Celerina?

First of all we give our school-children a holiday from Saturday, December 22, which is Florin's day, till Abel's day on January 2. Dagobert's day is a joyous, expectant Sunday, and then on Adam and Eve's day, which we call La vigilia da Nadel, we begin in earnest. The children go round together from house to house and sing. You should hear them sing! It is not a bit like the hoarse shrieking of our poor, shivering English carollers on the doorstep. Everybody lets them in, for one thing, either into the great soler, the wide arched lobby, or, if there is a room big enough to hold them, into the room itself. And the air outside is dry as well as cold, and the children are well-clad and happy and welcome, and they sing their chanzuns in two or three parts as sweetly and boldly as little Welsh folk. Cakes, nuts, centimes and thanks reward them, and off they go with their concert to the next hospitable house. The day passes like lightning, and they sleep at night like tops. The unmarried youths and maidens sing too, because they cannot help it, and together, for who can be festive all by himself? but only in one or two stated places, so as not to

Then comes the great festa da Nadel itself, and it is a solemn day. We go to church and hear the predgia da Nadel, and commune together in la sencha tschaina. When we come out we greet each other with giaviisch bunas festas (in the plural, for there are festas still to come), and on the whole we behave as on a specially solemn Sunday. Families draw together, for Christmas is the family festival everywhere, and friends seek out friends, and praise God by being happy together.

Next dawns Stephen's day, il firol da Nadel. The snow slopes swarm with lads and ski and maidens and sledges, for this is the first real play-day since October. And all are merrily excited, for they know what is coming. Let us hope that no fire will break out in the evening, for all our population will be gathered in the big room of the Hotel Misani, around the children's böschin da Nadel, the flashing, glittering, smiling, richly-laden Christmas-tree. The children sing again, all together, and recite one by one, and just at the right moment the tree yields up its fruit. Every boy in the two villages, and every girl, has been remembered by the little conspiracy of women which attends to this. If I tell you what the regals are going to be this year, you will not let it out before the time, will you? Every boy is to have a famous pair of guants, ski-gloves, that go halfway up the arm, and have no fingers to them, and every girl an embroidered work-bag. (I had rather be a boy than a girl.) And of course, there will be cakes—the special sort called biscottins—and bags of fruit and nuts and things to carry home.

On John the Evangelist, and Little Children's Day, and Jonathan, the sober elders are at work, and the matrons are working for their lives. But the children are playing all about, and making it as good as a holiday even for the workers, and on one of these days, very likely, our young men and maidens will have a schlitteda to Sils or Zuoz. Room for two, one of each kind, in every sledge. There are places in these mountain roads where the young man requires both hands for his horse; but there are also places where one will suffice for driving, and the other may be otherwise employed. Off they go in the morning, looking a little sheepish, and home they come at night, with much more human expressions on their faces.

David's day is Sunday. Silvester is celebrated by pleasant gatherings, but not so mightily as in Germany; and the New Year breaks. Biimaun is a day of days. Everybody greets everybody with a handshake and giavüsch bun an. The matrons are at home all the morning, keeping open house, and everybody else comes in, feasts on biscottins and home-made liquors and moves on. The afternoon is the matron's turn. They go round and try other people's biscottins and concoctions. But the children possess the whole day, and every dwelling. They make more visits than a postman, and cry everywhere Bun dè, bun an! dè 'm da biimaun—and everybody obeys! For their young friends, and for poor children, the kindly housewives have fine presents; but some present or other, be it only a nickel coin, is ready in every house for every child. You see in the Crow's Nest.

Then parents try in vain to make their children go to bed. They won't go, for they are afraid of going to sleep. Woe to him that sleepeth! At two o'clock in the bitter night these children are flocking to school, though school does not begin till eight; for the last comer will be Silvester for the year, and his sorry dignity will be ignominiously inaugurated. What they do here I don't know, but in the Lower Engadin they paint Silvester's face with cork, put him in a box and carry him in procession. I shall be very sorry for a handful of boys in this valley, when school begins. They will be suffering to inculcate the virtue of early rising.

My friends in England, eau as giavüsch bunas festas, e bun an!

Celerina.

E. W. LUMMIS:

THE KINGS AND THE SHEPHERDS.*

THE moon was crescent, snowy still,
The morning mist clung round the hill,
And in the gulf of heaven alone,
A single star, far-flashing, shone;
When swift and gallantly did ride
To Jewry's town, three Sons of Pride.
"The King! the new King of the Earth!"
We would pay homage to his worth."
"The King of Earth lies at the inn,
Who shall the reign of peace begin."
They brought their gifts, those princes three;

A Babe lay on its mother's knee.
About they turned in wrath and scorn
And cursed themselves, and cursed the morn.

Hastened to Jewry's lord, those three,
And bade him slay Simplicity;
While one with force and craft of state
Doth grind the poor t'exalt the great;
Another doth a church uprear
With lies and ignorance and fear;
The last, with guile of tongue and pen,
In lust, doth wreck the homes of men;
And thus the lordly Sons of Pride
Defame the Earth which they o'er-ride.

* * * *

The moon was crescent, snowy still,
The morning mist clung round the hill,
And in the gulf of heaven alone,
A single star, far-flashing, shone;
As, staff in hand, along the down
Three Shepherds sought the grey-walled town.

'Twas Lowliness and Simple Truth
And Labour with his heart of ruth.
They found the Babe, they laughed and wept,

And in their souls his image kept.
Three sprigs of rosemary they brought;
After, their several ways they sought.
The furrow ended of his toil,
Stern Labour doth his heart assoil;
He sees, beyond the painful earth,
A maiden with a child of mirth,
Then to their greeting song he goes
And straight forgets his weary woes.
While Lowliness hath built a cot,
And dame and weanlings round him got;
And in his heart at break of day
Fair thoughts of earth and heaven play;
And Simple Truth his road hath trod,
Led by a Child, the way of God.
And thus those simple Shepherds three
Make peace and joy and charity.

LOWER MOSLEY STREET SCHOOLS. 1837—1906.

THE above were the dates inscribed on the richly illuminated address presented by the schools to Mr. Steinthal on Saturday last. On the opening day of the new school Mr. Steinthal was taken there by his father, and through all the intervening period his interest in the school has remained fresh and strong.

Naturally, it was felt that an interest like this could not be sufficiently marked by a mere share in the general celebrations of Mr. Steinthal's eightieth birthday, which took place at the Memorial Hall last month. And so a special meeting was held at the School on Saturday last. The gathering was in many ways a remarkable one. Scattered among the crowds of younger men and women were many veterans—Mr. Steinthal's colleagues through half a century. Among these were Colonel Pilcher, V.D., J.P., who presided; Principal Reynolds, M.A., Mr. R. Wade, Mr. N. Dumville, and many others. Mr. Dumville was choirmaster more than fifty years ago, and naturally he set the note of the meeting in a song which age touched with feeling but did not rob of its sweetness: "Make new friends but keep the old." All the speeches were in this vein of gratitude and confidence. Mr. Reynolds presented the address and portrait. Herr Francke presented an address on behalf of evening school teachers. Unfortunately Mr. Steinthal could not be present in person to receive them, but he was well represented by his three sons, the eldest of whom responded in an interesting address, concluding with a message from his father. Mr. Wade presented a duplicate of the portrait, which the Rev. A. Cobden Smith received on behalf of the school. Mr. T. F. Robinson and the Rev. C. Peach also addressed the meeting.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare: Highland Place.—The Rev M. Evans, in his sermon last Sunday evening, referred to the refusal of the British Weekly to publish advertisements of Unitarian books, and proceeded to vindicate the right of Unitarians to the Christian name. The annual supper of the choir was held on Thursday evening, December 13, Councillor J. N. Williams presiding, supported by the Rev. M. Evans and other friends.

Action.—The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed lectured at the Unitarian Church, on Dec. 17, on "The Social Problem and the Churches," Mr. Stanley Udale took the chair. What we thought of as the social problem, the lecturer said, consisted in the existence of almost savage conditions of life among a large proportion of our fellow creatures side by side with extreme luxury, and in the conflict always felt to exist between the emotions and ideas cultivated in our churches and the actual facts of business life. The more privileged members of society cannot relieve themselves of responsibility for collective injustice, and any church which knows its true work and is living must be in contact with social questions. He dwelt upon the nature of our industrial system, and showed that while it time tended to exaggerate the value of the means of life as opposed to life itself. To teach, as the churches have sometimes done, that spiritual matters are the only urgent things in life is a mistake, for the essentials of human life—love, saintliness, poetry—can only co-exist with and are dependent upon some control of the means of living; but most of us fall into the error of wishing for more than we have, however much that may be. The whole nature of life would be changed if each one with the power of choice selected a wholesome, worthy life, and could be brought to realise how much more important it was that the world's disinherited ones shall have some of the means of life rather than that they themselves should obtain more. This feeling it was the duty of the church to create, and by doing so it would be helping forward the coming of the Kingdom. Questions and an interesting discussion followed.

Astley.—A sale of work was held at the Unitarian School on Saturday, December 15, to raise funds for the renovation of the chapel and school. Mr. G. H. Leigh, of Worsley, performed the opening ceremony, the Rev. P. Holt presiding over a good attendance. The Rev. J. J. Wright proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Leigh, and the Rev. R. S. Redfern seconded. The proceeds of the sale amounted to £68, being a little over £50 clear.

Belfast: Stanhope-street Domestic Mission.—On Sunday last at the evening service a mural brass tablet was unveiled, bearing the following inscription:—"Sacred to the memory of Maria Glenny, widow of Dr. A. G. Malcolm, who entered into rest 27th May, 1906, aged 79 years. It was through her zeal for good works that this Domestic Mission was founded in 1853, and for more than 50 years she remained its generous supporter and most constant friend. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

Crewe.—The Rev. H. Fisher Short has just given two Sunday evening lectures in the Free Christian Church, prompted by a public discussion between a local Christadelphian and a "Young Evangelist." His subjects were "The Immortality of the Soul" and "The Doctrine of the Trinity." Both lectures were well reported locally.

Edinburgh.—The annual social meeting of the congregation of St. Mark's was held on Thursday evening, December 13, in Darling's Temperance Hotel. Over a hundred members and friends assembled, under the chairmanship of Rev. R. B. Drummond, who after tea gave an address, in which he referred with pleasure to his recent visit to Aberdeen to preach in the fine new church, and said that with the help of the McQuaker Trustees he was arranging for another course of lectures to be delivered in St. Mark's by ministers of all denominations who would accept the invitation. Mr. Whytock, who is retiring from the secretaryship after a service of ten years, was presented with a beautiful silver tea service and bronze ornaments subscribed for by members of the congregation. Mr. Drummond made the presentation, and Mr. Whytock feelingly replied. One of the happiest of meetings was brought to a close in the orthodox Scotch fashion by the company joining in singing "Auld Lang Syne."

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant gratefully acknowledges the receipt of postal orders for £1 5s. in aid of his Poor's Purse from "W. W."

London: George's Row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers gratefully acknowledges the receipt of £1 5s. from "W. W." for the Poor's Purse.

London: Stamford Street and Blackfriars Mission.—The Rev. W. L. Tucker begs to acknowledge the receipt of £1 5s. from "W. W." for the Poor's Purse.

London: Stoke Newington Green (Resignation).—The Rev. Wm. Wooding, B.A., having intimated that, owing to stress of work and advancing years, he felt unable to continue his services as minister after the termination of his present year of office, a special meeting of the congregation was held on the 12th inst. On the motion of the chairman, Mr. F. W. Turner, a resolution was unanimously adopted expressive of the greatest regret at Mr. Wooding's retirement, thanking him most sincerely for his twenty-five years' service, and tendering to him the warmest affectionate regard of all the members of the congregation. Several speakers warmly supported the resolution, and gave expression more especially to the affection felt for Mr. Wooding. A resolution of grateful appreciation of the whole-hearted manner in which Mrs. Wooding and family had co-operated in the various activities of the Church was unanimously adopted. It was left to the committee to take such steps as might be deemed best to obtain the services of a minister to succeed Mr. Wooding.

Preston.—A sale of work was held last week to further reduce the debt of £400 on the new schools which were opened last December, the cost having been £900. The sale realised the sum of £155.

Rochdale (Resignation).—The Blackwater-street congregation have received with great regret the resignation of their minister, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who has accepted a new appointment as Field Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Concerning this work a note appears in another column. Mr.

Spedding settled at Rochdale in 1886, as minister of Clover-street Chapel, and on the resignation of the Rev. T. Carter at Blackwater-street the two congregations were united under Mr. Spedding's charge. In Sunday-school work, in educational affairs in the town, and as an earnest liberal politician Mr. Spedding has done notable work, and he will be greatly missed in Rochdale. He felt, however, that after twenty years a change would in any case be good for him and for the church. After the eminent success during the past summer of the Van Mission under his direction and inspiration it was clear that he was the man to be called by the Association to the new work he is now to undertake.

Sheffield District Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly Conference was held on Saturday, December 8, in the schoolroom of the Church of Our Father, Rotherham. About forty teachers and friends, representatives of all the schools of the Union, were present. After tea the Rev. William Stephens took the chair, and the president of the Union, the Rev. J. Ruddle, of Stannington, read a paper on "The Word of God," in which he pointed out the difference between the old conception of the Bible as "The Word of God," and the inward voice by which God has spoken, in law-giver, prophet, and psalmist, and in many a crisis of individual human life, and still speaks to us to-day. J. W. Cock proposed and the Rev. C. J. Street seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Ruddle, with warm approval of the doctrine of his paper.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—Mr. J. Walter Cook, whom many friends learnt to know as the indefatigable local secretary at the Oxford Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, is now acting as assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street. At the Vesper musical service to-morrow, in place of a sermon, Mr. Street will give readings from the Rev. H. W. Hawkes's poem, "The Man of Nazareth." At a social evening held in Channing Hall on Wednesday, December 12, a presentation of a Dublin University silk gown was made to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., by Mrs. Kirke on behalf of the ladies of the congregation as a token of their affection and esteem. Mr. Street, in his reply, stated that the last ten years of his ministry had been the happiest in his life, and hoped the time was far distant when he would need to sever his connection with Sheffield.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The Rev. A. H. Dolphin's morning sermons during December, as announced in the Church Calendar, are all based on articles in the Hibbert Journal. "Jesus, the Prophet," is to-morrow's subject.

Stockport.—A sale of work was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday and Thursday, Dec. 5 and 6, for the benefit of the church funds. Notwithstanding the extremely inclement weather on the first day, the proceeds realised £57. The second day produced about £33, and the total has since been made up to nearly £100. A special feature of the undertaking was the hearty way in which the Sunday-school and the Women's Social Meeting joined in the effort, their joint stall having made £30. The results of the sale exceeded expectations. The total results of the year's special efforts amount to nearly £200.

Styal.—On Saturday, December 1, a bazaar funds of a beautiful small Council Room which has recently been erected in connection with Norcliffe Chapel, and adjoining the vestry. Mr. Henry P. Greg, the chairman of Norcliffe Chapel, took the chair at 3 o'clock. The bazaar was opened by Mr. Ernest W. Greg, J.P., of Bolton, who made interesting reference to his early life in Styal, and complimented the chapel on possessing a band of young people who had so splendidly worked for the erection of that beautiful room, a circumstance, he said, which made it easy for him to consent to do what he had felt he was never going to do again, i.e., open a bazaar. An interesting feature was the enthusiastic manner in which the adult classes of the Sunday-school had thrown themselves into the work of the bazaar, largely producing as well as contributing to its stores. A little over £80 was realised, which more than satisfied the expectations of the workers.

Yorkshire S.S. Union.—A conference of teachers was held at Dewsbury on Saturday, December 8, when between forty and fifty friends from Leeds (Mill Hill, Holbeck, and Hunslet), Wakefield, Lydgate, &c., attended. After tea, the chair was occupied by the president, Mr. E. O. Dodgson, and the Rev. W. Rosling, of Bradford, read a paper on "Some Difficulties of Sunday-school Teaching, and how they may be met." The paper emphasised the great value of encouragement to the teacher, and the "Socratic" handling of the restless scholar. The chairman made an interesting contribution to the discussion, and the Rev. John Ellis urged the need of a small class-book on the story of our churches. Others who spoke included Messrs. Clayton, Brooke, Harrison, Jackson, Slater, and the Revs. W. R. Shanks and H. Cross. A vote of thanks to the reader of the paper and the Dewsbury friends brought the conference to a close.

TOWARDS THE NEW YEAR.

At the end of another year we remember with great thankfulness the generous kindness of many friends towards THE INQUIRER, assurances of sympathy and help, which give us fresh courage to go forward into the New Year, conscious, indeed, of many short-comings, but determined to make that only a spur to fresh endeavour, and with undaunted hope to achieve some better service in the time to come.

And here, as a most fitting word of farewell to the old and of greeting to the new as it draws near, we will set once more that scripture of the passing year, which is never stale, but must have continuing inspiration for those who trust in the Eternal Goodness and care for the welfare of their people and their land :—

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes,
But ring the fuller minstrel in.

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old;
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land;
Ring in the CHRIST that is to be!

The New Year will bring to us the old tasks, in the special service of our community of Free Churches, and in the service of pure unsectarian religion, wherever we can reach a helping hand or speak a helpful word. It will still be our endeavour to have a firm hold upon the essential things of the religious life, to express all the truth that is made clear to us, to rejoice in what is true and good and beautiful wherever it is to be recognised, in whatever church connection or beyond the borders of the churches. It is life that must always be our concern, the true life with GOD. And our prayer is, that it may be given us, with deep and calm assurance, to know the truth and manifest its power; to be of service in sustaining all faithful endeavour, and to work towards the dawning of a better day, both in a fuller measure of religious fellowship and a more perfect realising of the kingdom of God on earth.

We shall hope fully to sustain the interest in liberal religious literature, and to keep in touch with all important movements of church life in our midst. In our own connection the development of the Van Mission will be a special interest, and we have also to look forward to the fourth meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Boston in September. It will be our fully when they come, but to prepare for them by such study of religious movements in America, and the personal aspects of the Liberal movement in New England, as may deepen the interest both of those who go to Boston (and we trust they will be many) and those who are obliged to share from a distance in the happiness and stimulus of that great gathering.

The story of the Pilgrim Fathers, the beginning of the Liberal movement, the lives of such men as Channing and Parker, of Emerson and Whittier, and others connected with the anti-slavery struggle and the Transcendental movement, are full of living interest, and the study of them may well be taken up with special reference to the coming International.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1906.

THE retrospect of this first year of Liberal government, after the long Unionist administration of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, takes back our thoughts to the change of Government at the close of 1905, with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's acceptance of office, and the most emphatic endorsement of it by the country in the General Election with which the present year opened. The Liberal victory was, in fact, overwhelming, except within the special circle of Birmingham, and far more sweeping than anyone had anticipated. The War majority of 1900 was 402 Unionists to 185 Liberals; in this year's election the majority was 429 Liberals, including the Labour men, to 157 Unionists, the 83 Nationalists being one more than at the previous General Election.

At the close of the year the country has an object lesson of what has to be faced, even after such an unmistakable verdict, in the work of Liberal legislation, from the great obstacle of the House of Lords, as at present constituted. The Government Education Bill, passed in July after the fullest consideration by the House of Commons with a majority of 192, was sent back by the House of Lords not so much amended as transformed into a different Bill, impossible of acceptance by the Government. It was introduced by Mr. Birrell in the hope of overcoming the religious difficulty, and to establish beyond question the fundamental principles that with support from public funds must go a genuine public control, and that in a national system of education there must be no religious disability or tests for admission, to meet as far as possible the difficulties of extreme denominationalists, but these attempts at conciliating conflicting views even at the cost of strict principle, were met in the House of Lords by the Archbishop's much more far reaching demands, and other amendments, which turned the Bill into a pronounced denominational measure. Further efforts to reach a working compromise failed. The Lords, following the lead of Mr. Balfour, insisted on their amendments, and the Government therefore withdrew the Bill. The result, both as affecting education and the position of the House of Lords, belongs to the future. The Church Times, indeed, uttered a whoop of triumph; but the Spectator, representing a large body of moderate Church opinion, having striven earnestly for a settlement, deeply deplores the failure, and holds that neither the Archbishop of Canterbury nor Mr. Balfour will long have reason to be satisfied with their action in this matter. Speaking in the House of Commons on the motion to discharge the Order, the Prime Minister said:—"A settlement has been prevented, and for that calamity we know, and the country knows, upon whom the responsibility lies. But the resources of the British Constitution are not wholly exhausted. The resources of the House of Commons are not exhausted. And I say with conviction a way must be found, and a way will be found, by which the will of the people expressed through their elected representatives shall be made to prevail." That the loss of the Bill is a calamity not all friends of progressive education are agreed. It is widely held that too great concessions were offered to the denominational interests, and that some better way towards a truly national settlement must be sought. Meanwhile, vigorous administration may effect much towards greater educational efficiency.

While this chief Government measure, and also the Plural Voting Bill, have been lost through the action of the House of Lords, this session has by no means been barren of positive result. A number of useful measures, including the Trades Disputes and the Workmen's Compensation Bills, have been passed, and the lesson of the Education debates will by no means be lost. It should be recorded that the Bishop of Hereford alone among the representatives of the Church in the House of Lords voted with the Government (as did the Duke of Devonshire) against the motion which finally destroyed the hope of conciliation over the Education Bill. About the same time, it is pleasant to remember that Dr. Charles W. Stubbs, the Dean of Ely, was consecrated Bishop of Truro.

The close of the year has also been marked by the promulgation of the constitution giving immediate self-government to the Transvaal, and the promise of a similar constitution for the Orange River Colony early in the New Year. At the same time, the veto of the Imperial Government on conditions of servile labour is maintained, and the present system of indentured Chinese labour in the mines of the Transvaal is to be brought to a speedy end.

to Russia. The year's record is dreary in the extreme, and closes with the report of dreadful sufferings from famine, added to the other burdens of that unhappy land. It was while the Interparliamentary Conference on Peace and Arbitration was assembled in London in July, representative of twenty-two Parliaments, including the youngest of them, the Russian Duma, that news of the dissolution of the Duma by the Tsar arrived. The feeling of the country was nobly expressed by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in presence of the delegates of all those national assemblies, when he exclaimed, "The Duma is dead; long live the Duma!"

A conflict of a very different character has been proceeding in France. In January the Law of Separation between the Churches and the State came into force. (M. Fallières, in that same month, succeeded M. Loubet as President of the Republic.) And at the May elections there was again a great majority in favour of the Government. The Pope has obstinately refused all conciliation, and whether misinformed by his advisers, or in spite of the known willingness of many of the bishops to fall in with the necessary arrangements, has forbidden their recognition of the law. Opportunity has been given to the bishops and clergy, not only under the law of separation, but the earlier law of public meetings (1881) and the Associations law of 1901, to legalise their position, and maintain public worship, but the close of the year sees the conflict still further accentuated, the Papal representative arrested and expelled the country, the residences of bishops and parsonages passing into the hands of the State, and penalties accumulating upon the priests who continue illegally to celebrate mass. The Protestant churches, on the other hand, have readily accepted the law, and are taking steps to consolidate their own position. We have recorded during the year the efforts of the Liberals in the Reformed Church to secure unity, and notably the victory of the Liberal sentiment for unity at the Jarnac Assembly in October.

In Germany the efforts to maintain the Liberal position in the Church have been vigorously carried on, and the wide acceptance of such popular religious literature as the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, now of Tübingen, and the new Translation and Commentary on the New Testament, published by Messrs. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht of Göttingen, are welcome signs; but the orthodox authorities are still exercising a sinister influence, which interferes with the appointment of Liberals even where congregations are eager to receive them.

For our brethren in America the year was made memorable by the suffering and loss entailed by the destruction of San Francisco by the earthquake of April 18, and by the brave and noble spirit in which that calamity was met. We heard with sorrow also of the breakdown of the health of Dr. M. J. Savage, of New York. The American Unitarian Association, while vigorously carrying on their own work, have been busy in the preparations for the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers to be held in Boston in September next.

OUR FREE CHURCHES.

Among our own churches the points of fresh interest have been many. First in order of time came the departure of Dr. W. Tudor Jones for Wellington, New Zealand, where the new Unitarian Church under his guidance has had a most prosperous year; and the close of the visit to this country of Professor B. Nath Sen, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, Secretary of the United Brahmo Samaj Committee.

Manchester College.

At the annual meeting of Manchester

College in January, momentous changes were announced, which were accomplished at Midsummer, Dr. Drummond retiring from the Principalship, which he has held for twenty-one years, and his professorship for thirty-seven years, and Dr. J. Edwin Odgers from the Hibbert Lectureship in Ecclesiastical History, which he had held for the past twelve years. A portrait of Dr. Drummond, by Sir George Reid, was presented to the College by his old students and a number of other friends. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter has been appointed Principal of the College; Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow University, has accepted a lectureship in Philosophy, and the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., has been appointed special preacher and lecturer on Preaching and the Conduct of Religious Service, for the present session.

At Willaston School, Mr. Guy Lewis, the first head master, has been succeeded by Mr. H. L. Jones.

The Unitarian Home Missionary College, in the enjoyment of its new residence in Victoria Park, and the open Theological Faculty in the Victoria University, has had a prosperous year, and is appealing for the completion of the Jubilee Fund of £20,000, as a necessary endowment.

National Conference.

In April the ninth Triennial meeting of the National Conference was held at Oxford, under the presidency of Mr. William Bowring. The Rev. Joseph Wood, who preached the Conference sermon, was elected the new president, and the Rev. Dr. Hunter, who preached another special sermon, was elected a member of the Conference. The meetings were notable for the special stress laid upon social questions, and for the participation of distinguished members of other churches in the meetings. A special report, with the whole of the sermons and papers, appeared in THE INQUIRER. The National Conference Union for Social Service has been actively at work, encouraging the churches especially in the study of social problems. The Social Questions Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire has been a pioneer in that direction, and the Social Study Circle in connection with Hope-street Church, Liverpool, has further shown what can be done, by its organising of a successful public meeting to call attention to the evils of sweating and various employments of women.

Of a somewhat different character, for the promotion of fellowship among the members of the churches and the encouragement of good work, are the Women's Social Club successfully established in London and the recently formed Yorkshire Unitarian Club.

B. & F. U. A.

At Whitsuntide, the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., delivered the Essex Hall lecture, on "The Making of Religion," and the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was preached by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, whose subject was "The Covenant of the Spirit." At the business meeting a resolution was unanimously passed, rejoicing in the great services rendered by the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, and giving the assurance of earnest co-operation in the effort to make the fourth meeting of the Council, to be held at Boston, Mass., in September, 1907, "a notable occasion in the annals of religious progress." Members of the Committee are co-operating with the British members of the International Committee and representatives of the London Laymen's Club to secure the success of Dr. Herbert Smith's "Boston Conference Fund," which is to enable as many of our ministers as possible to attend that meeting. The proceedings of the third International meeting, held at Geneva in 1905, were issued in a substantial volume early in the present year.

Another successful summer session for Sunday-school teachers was held at Manchester College, Oxford, early in July. Of the lectures then given two were by Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," and his translation of that Early Christian document, with a most valuable Introduction and notes, has since been published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in admirable form.

Publications.

Other publications of the Association during the year have been the "Memoir of Richard Acland Armstrong," with a selection of his sermons, which came as a New Year's gift, a fourth edition of Mr. Armstrong's "God and Soul," and also of Dr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels"; a popular abridged edition of Dr. Charles Beard's Hubbert Lectures, on "The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century," in the series of sixpenny reprints. A new and revised edition of the Rev. Joseph Wood's "The Bible, What It Is and Is Not," the Rev. W. J. Jupp's "Religion of Nature and of Human Experience," The Essex Hall Lecture on "The Making of Religion," by Dr. Crothers; a second volume of twelve sermons, by as many Unitarian ministers, a companion to last year's volume; a substantial volume entitled "Memorable Unitarians, being a series of Brief Biographical Sketches" (which begins with Ulphilas and ends with James Martineau); a revised and enlarged edition of the "Record of Unitarianism," the Rev. F. B. Mott's "Short Unitarian History," and a new issue of valuable Unitarian facts, the first twenty-four of which are also gathered up into two handy volumes with the titles: "What do Unitarians Believe and Teach," and "Religion and Theology of Unitarians." Among the publications of the Sunday-school Association have been a new edition of the Code Book, Miss J. E. Brown's "George Smith of Coalville," the Rev. Alfred Hall's "James Martineau: The Story of his Life," and his summer session lecture on "The Moral Teaching of James Martineau"; also "The Children's Hour," by Miss F. E. Cooke, a collection for the most part of her contributions to the "Children's Column," of THE INQUIRER.

The Van Mission.

The successful launching of the Unitarian Van Mission has been a great interest of the year. To the Missionary Conference in Manchester the credit of this new departure is due, and especially to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, to whose earnest zeal and organising ability the success of the first season's work has been largely due. From the middle of May until early in October the Van was in the field in Lancashire and Yorkshire, in charge of Mr. Bertram Talbot, and served by a constant succession of ministers and other helpers. The response was such that the fire has kindled, and an unexpected number of men have proved their capacity for such an open air ministry. There is promise of four vans for next year. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has undertaken the responsibility of the growing work, and has appointed Mr. Spedding, Field Agent, to take charge of it and other missionary operations.

Other missionary efforts have included services at Ilford, Wimbledon, and West Kirby, and summer services at Douglas, Windermere, and Harrogate. The newly formed congregation at Newport, Mon., has made good progress, and a vigorous effort is being renewed to establish a congregation at Blackburn.

New Buildings.

The year will be memorable in Aberdeen for the opening of the fine new church in Skene-street. New churches have also been opened at Acton and Ansdell, Pontypridd and Capel-y-fadfa, and at West Bowling, Bradford, where a new home was needed by the Rev. W. Rosling and the members of his congregation, who seceded with him from the Ryan-street Congregational Church. Mr. Rosling has received a cordial welcome into the fellowship of Unitarian ministers. A school-church has also been opened at Attercliffe, Sheffield, and new school buildings at Padiham, Walthamstow, and Mountpottinger, Belfast. New churches are building at Ashton and Sychbant (Cardingshire).

Centenary and Other Celebrations.

The Padiham building was a memorial of the centenary, which was happily celebrated, as was that at Newchurch, in Rossendale, both congregations having had their origin in the movement which arose from the expulsion in 1806 of Joseph Cooke, of Rochdale, from the congregation at Lye also celebrated its centenary, and Rotherham a bicentenary, while at Norwich the 150th anniversary of the opening of the Octagon Chapel was kept. Two jubilees of present church buildings were at Bank-street, Bolton, and St. Vincent-street, Glasgow. The ninetieth birthday of the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, of Chester, and the eightieth birthday of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, were made the occasion of warm demonstrations of honour and affection. The Rev. Charles Hargrove completed this year thirty years of ministry at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford forty years at Lewin's Mead, Bristol.

Ministerial Changes.

There have been again a large number of ministerial changes during the year.

The Rev. F. E. Millson, after thirty-four years of service at Halifax, has retired, as have also the Revs. W. Mellor from Huddersfield, and John Fox from Hunslet, Leeds. The Rev. Douglas Walmsley has resigned the First Church at Belfast, the Revs. Edward Parry, Ilminster, W. Lindsay, Christ Church, Nottingham, and F. Wood, Sunderland. The following removals have taken place: the Revs. A. H. Thomas from Stourbridge to the Great Meeting, Leicester; J. Ruddle, from Chorlton to Stannington; A. C. Fox from Glossop to Moss Side, Manchester; J. B. Higham from Wolverhampton to Park-lane, Wigan; H. E. Haycock from Chester to Halliwell-road, Bolton; E. G. Evans from Chesterfield to Dukinfield, and H. S. Tayler from Dukinfield to Chesterfield; F. H. Vaughan from Hull to Mansfield; Jenkin Thomas from Rawtenstall to Glossop; H. Dawtrey from Sheffield to Broughton, Manchester; Eustace Thompson from Bermondsey to the Stanhope-street Mission, Belfast; J. A. Shaw from Newchurch to Wolverhampton; W. E. George from Swinton to Chorlton; E. A. Voysey from West Bromwich to Northampton. Further settlements have been:—The Revs. C. A. Ginever at Dover; R. Finnerty at Portsmouth (he goes to Ilminster), T. R. Skemp at Southampton, T. A. Gorton at Moseley, Birmingham, F. Hankinson at Kentish Town, A. Farquharson at Maidstone, C. Sneddon at Kirkcaldy, H. E. Perry at Denton, C. E. Reed at Ringwood, J. Islan Jones at Accrington, Edgar Lockett at Banbridge, S. S. Brettell at Darlington, Dr. J. Ewart at Stourbridge, D. J. Evans at Chester, Jesse Hipperson at Bermondsey, H. McLachlan at Hunslet, and as assistant to the Rev. C. Hargrove at Mill Hill, Leeds; J. M. Connell at Bury St. Edmunds, Douglas Hoole at Garston. Coming changes are the Revs. Simon Jones from Pontypridd to Swansea; W. Whitaker from Cardiff to Hull, W. Wooding to retire from Stoke Newington Green; and T. P. Spedding from Rochdale to become Field Agent to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

OBITUARY.

The year's obituary includes the names of the aged King Christian IX. of Denmark and George Jacob Holyoake, veteran reformer and the historian of Co-operation; Henrik Ibsen and Albert Réville; Thomas Hornblower Gill, the Rev. G. Matheson, hymn-writer, Mr. A. M. Dose, a leader of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj, in Calcutta; Mr. Alfred Beit, J. L. Toole, and Sir Sydney Waterlow; Mrs. William Grey, Miss Maitland, Principal of Somerville College, Oxford, Mrs. McLaren (John Bright's sister), and Lady Campbell-Bannermann. Science has lost Professor Currie, who discovered radium; Art, Sir Wyke Bayliss, President of the R.S.B.A., and Literature, Dr. Richard Garnett and Mrs. Craigie (John Oliver Hobbes). From the world of politics, Mr. Richard Seddon, Prime Minister of New Zealand is gone, and also Michael Davitt, Colonel Sanderson, and Sir Wilfred Lawson; from the Church, Lord Alwyne Compton, late Bishop of Ely, Dr. Gott, Bishop of Truro, Dr. Bickersteth, the late Bishop of Exeter; and Principal Rainy, the first Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland.

From the Fellowship of our Churches we have lost William Colfox and David Ainsworth, former Presidents of Manchester College, Oxford, and the latter also of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Edwin Clephan, also a past President of the Association; G. Carslake Thompson, F. Angier Harrison, Arthur Curren Briggs, Wybert Reeve, Dr. John Cameron, of Liverpool, and Basil Martineau; Miss Emma Taylor, of Starston, Miss Teschemacher, Mrs. Cash, Mrs. Sydney Courtauld, Mrs. Robert D. Holt, Miss Emily Booth, Mrs. George Buckton, Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold; and the wives of four of our ministers, Mrs. Joseph Wood, Mrs. Albert Thornhill, Mrs. G. L. Phelps and Mrs. Matthew R. Scott.

From the roll of our ministers we have lost the Revs. J. Bevan, J. J. Bishop, J. F. K. Kennard, Thomas Leyland, Richard C. Moore, J. A. Newell, A. Stradling, and H. Kelsey White; with whom we may well reckon Herbert Rix, and also the Rev. W. Brunton, who ministered for many years in America, but was formerly a student of the Home Missionary Board, and the Rev. John Crawford Woods, the first minister of the Unitarian Church in Adelaide, South Australia. Veterans these for the most part, but among them were younger men, for whom one might have hoped long years of service. They bid us keep our lamps burning, and at the same time, not to forget that greater fellowship, of which we also in humility and faithfulness must pray to be found not unworthy.

THE RELIGIOUS LITERATURE OF 1906.

It would be wiser probably to give some estimate of the religious literature of ten years ago than to attempt to say anything about the books of the last twelve months. We are too close to the latter either to detect general tendencies or to appraise intrinsic values. Still, as the reviewer yields to the invitation to cast his eye backwards and to record what he has seen on his literary travels during the year, certain impressions begin to take definite shape in his mind. These impressions must not be taken as final verdicts. He cannot tell whether after the lapse of years with an enlarged experience he may still desire to return to the wayside shrines which have seemed very pleasant to him, still less whether the dull wide-spreading land—an unexpected fascination of colour and line to a more practised eye. But one thing he knows, namely, what he has felt himself; and if it happens that he has been startled by the spell which some book great in thought and style has cast about him, he will be eager to share his discovery. It may be the dulness of my own critical faculty which prompts the confession that I have no such discovery to announce: I see in retrospect a very few books which I have read with real interest. I see a long series of books which represent much conscientious labour which wins our respect, and the conventional intellectual equipment of the modern theologian which deserves our pity. I see piles of books, with the firelight glinting off their bright covers, to which the reviewer sets himself down stolidly, deaf to the appeal of the poets and sages on his shelves, while he seeks, often vainly, for some grains of gold amid the vast heaps of sand. One of our chief literary desiderata is a lethal chamber for books. It should be so contrived that only what is needed by the world because it is beautiful or robust can survive, while everything else is reduced at once to the little heap of dust which we are told will be the fate of most modern books at the end of a hundred years. Every publishing house should be compelled by law to submit its highly advertised wares to the severe kindness of this lethal chamber before they are allowed even to come into the hands of the patient reviewer. What a saving it would involve of temper and brains. What pleasant spaces of life would be rescued from the clutches of poor novels and weak theology. How quickly men would recover the lost art of reading quietly and thoughtfully. How eager we should be to forget the evil days when feeble books were puffed with the vulgar persistency of patent medicines, and popular authors vied with professional athletes in the art of self-advertisement. But meanwhile, the Editor reminds me forcibly that I am not keeping to the path marked out for me; so I commend this first sketch of a book-lover's Utopia to the ingenious imagination of Mr. Wells, and return to the matter in hand, which is the religious literature in this year of grace 1906.

In the paragraphs which follow only a few of the more significant books in each department are mentioned, and no attempt is made to cover the large field of foreign literature, except in the case of translations into English.

For most of the more radical critical and constructive work we are still largely dependent upon Germany. The reason for this may be the greater freedom of the faculties of theology in the German universities from the confessionism of the churches. With us every theologian bears a denominational label, and everything he writes is judged by its conformity to his ecclesiastical atmosphere. A translation of a book, which comes to us from Berlin or Leipzig or Jena, is welcomed on its merits, and discussed as a contribution to knowledge or critical theory. Precisely the same opinions set forth by an English writer with equal scholarship and ability are treated as the result of sectarian animus, unless he has the good fortune to belong to one of the large and popular churches. Nobody thinks of calling him a Unitarian, but the label is ready instantly in order to disparage in the popular mind similar or perhaps less extreme opinions on criticism and history, when they are brought forward by the Principal of Manchester College. The result of this state of things is that our original thinkers, who have no confessional interest to serve, are discouraged. They know that they have no public, and that books over which they may have spent years of labour will have no chance of receiving the kind of recognition which is accorded at once to those, of precisely the same stamp and colour, which come to us from Germany. During the past year three historical studies of the life of Christ have appeared, and they are all translated from the German. There has been the vigorous and illuminating little book on Jesus by Bousset; Nathaniel Schmidt's much longer and more elaborate book on "The Prophet of Nazareth" has also appeared; and lastly, "Jesus," by Arno Neumann. The last volume has an additional value on account of the long preface contributed by Professor Schmiedel, in which he makes a vigorous reply to the rather stupid misunderstanding of his remark in the Encyclopedia Biblica about the nine undoubtedly genuine sayings in the Synoptic narrative.

Among other books dealing directly with the New Testament writings the two new volumes in the Theological Translation Library should be mentioned. Weinle's "St. Paul" is an interesting and living book, which has had the advantage of a good translator. St. Paul lives in these pages as a real man. Personality is not eclipsed by theological tendencies. The other volume is the first instalment of Pfeiderer's "Primitive Christianity," which is devoted entirely to St. Paul. In clearness of historical presentment it is inferior to Weinle, and it is still far too much involved in the methods of criticism, the abstract and theological attitude towards primitive Christian history, which were fashionable in the author's youth. Pfeiderer does not go so far as to say that St. Paul was the inventor of Christianity, but his attitude does a good deal to encourage that most amazing of historical heresies. A welcome corrective to this too abstract and formal method is supplied by Sir William Ramsay's recent volume, "Pauline and other Studies." It is brimming over with archaeology and first hand knowledge of Roman provincial government, all conveyed with the incisive pen and the too ready scorn for the mere literary student, which we know so well. The essay on the statesmanship of St. Paul is particularly good, but the opening chapter, on "Shall we hear evidence or not?" shows that the hand of the author is more practised in telling the story of an inscription than in philosophical and doctrinal discussion. While the bulk of the volume is devoted to Pauline questions it contains as well several essays, which give fascinating glimpses into the indigenous religious life of Asia Minor at the time when it was blending with Christianity. Here we have Sir William Ramsay, at his best, with his close contact with the original sources, and his instinct for all the fresh clues which are supplied by fragments of papyrus or mutilated inscriptions or the remains of ancient buildings. It gains its ground, only it seems to increase in the bulk and minuteness of its learning, and to be content in consequence to exist chiefly for a very small group of specialists. Professor Briggs has issued the first volume of his massive commentary on the Psalms. It is excellent in its thoroughness and commands our distant respect; but it leaves the mind with a vague wonder whether it succeeds in bringing us at all nearer to the heart of the simplest and most exquisite religious lyrics which the world has known. Dr. Swete's edition of the Apocalypse gives the Greek text with a critical apparatus and a full commentary. It is perhaps a little conventional, and its usefulness would have been increased if more had been made of the illustrative material from Jewish apocalyptic literature, and there had been some attempt to deal frankly with the religious difficulties of the book for readers of the present day. I may mention also in this connection the massive "Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels," the first volume of which has just appeared. It is an elaborate example of the art of book-making. Dr. Hastings has discovered that his gift lies in the direction of organising dictionaries, and he claims that in his new venture he has entered upon an original field. The result is a highly artificial production. What is really needful has been given already in the Dictionary of the Bible. To make every word, every passing phrase, every different shade of spiritual meaning in the Gospels into a peg upon which to hang an article in a dictionary is in reality to destroy their simplicity, their naturalness, the genuine depth and power of their religious inspiration. In addition to this the writers are a strangely assorted company, and many of them trespass far beyond the bounds of ascertained knowledge into the curiosities of speculation. In one article, for instance, we are told that virginity is higher than the married state because it is the condition of the holy angels. This sort of thing does not help us in any way to understand either Christ or the Gospels.

There is a tendency, which I think is growing in strength, to turn away from the historical and literary criticism of the Gospels to an examination of their ethical teaching, firstly in its original meaning and secondly in its practical significance for modern life. For many men the fundamental Christian problem is no longer a doctrinal or metaphysical one at all. They want to know, what did Jesus actually teach? and is his teaching applicable in any real way to my life? This new ethical attitude is calling into existence a number of books engaged in the task of attack or defence. Mr. Garrod's volume, "The Religion of all Good Men and Other Studies in Christian Ethics," is one of them. It is clever and provocative, quite too confident and sweeping to be true; but it should be read, for it represents an attitude of mind which has to be reckoned with and treated with respect. On the other side there is Professor Peabody's excellent and moderating book on "Jesus Christ and the Christian Character," which appeared so late in 1905 that it may be included very fairly among this year's books. I should like to call attention also to the ~~new~~ ^{new} ~~George Trevelyan's~~ ^{new} ~~book~~ ^{book} ~~on the teaching of the~~ ^{book} ~~Lord's Prayer of remarkable beauty and~~ ^{book} ~~spiritual depth.~~ ^{book} But if on the one side it joins hands with the ethical movement which I have just mentioned, it belongs on the other to the movement of doctrinal reconstruction with the new emphasis on experience and the "will to believe," to which even the most conservative of churches has to open its doors. The controversy between the scientific and historical attitude to the world and traditional dogma is as acute within the Roman Catholic Church as beyond its borders. Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's fine novel, "Out of Due Time," is full of this problem of faith and motion, and Protestant readers may learn much from the conflict which it describes with insight and sympathy. Mr. Inge has published a little volume of addresses to Cambridge undergraduates called "Truth and Falsehood in Religion," which deals with the same question. Like everything he writes, it is broad-minded and stimulating. It contains a noble plea for the rights of the intellect in religion but it all becomes a little baffling when we are asked to fit this strong individual thought into the framework of the Anglican Prayer-book. A book by the Rev. D. S. Cairns or "Christianity and the Modern World," should be mentioned as well. He is apparently more conscious than many writers that a problem of immense magnitude really exists, and that no re-arrangement of traditional conceptions will meet the case; but when he attempts the work of reconstruction, he falls back with fatal ease upon the entrenchments of his inherited creed, and allows himself to juggle with words and ideas borrowed from science or philosophy without any adequate intellectual analysis. Notwithstanding this defect, the book contains many suggestive points of view, and amidst many dilettante performances must be recognised as the work of a thinker.

In the wide field of ecclesiastical history there is not much to record. We have had Dr. Bigg's pleasant "Wayside Sketches," and the first volume of Dr. Lindsay's substantial "History of the Reformation" in the International Library. The Life of Griffith John, of China Mission fame, and "Wesley and His Century" by the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, who has turned aside from "Deeds that Won the Empire" to tell the story of a spiritual Empire-builder, are both welcome additions to popular biography. A book for which we cannot predict many readers, though the few are to be congratulated, is the first volume of a collected edition of the "Letters of Erasmus" in the Latin text, edited by Mr. P. S. Allen. For Franciscan students there is the welcome gift of a critical text of the two lives by Thomas of Celano, for which they have waited so long. Thomas may not have been a faultless historian, but his work is worthy of the care which has now been lavished upon it, and we owe it to him to remember the request to his readers with which he closed his book, "ut coram Deo mei meminerint peccatoris." In the history of religious thought "The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century," by A. W. P. ~~should be mentioned for those~~ ^{should be mentioned for those} ~~one-sided, and with it, though not at all~~ ^{one-sided, and with it, though not at all} ~~in the same rank, the very small book~~ ^{in the same rank, the very small book} ~~by Goldwin Smith, called "In Quest of~~ ^{by Goldwin Smith, called "In Quest of} ~~Light," with its insistent and yet~~ ^{Light," with its insistent and yet} ~~baffled yearning for a sure and certain~~ ^{baffled yearning for a sure and certain} ~~hope of immortality. I have left two books intentionally to the last. The first is Dr. Abbott's "Silanus the Christian," a fine imaginative study of the conflict of the higher paganism with the growing power of the Gospel. Incidentally the book is full of subtle and acute exposition of the Gospel narratives, but its central interest is in the study of a human soul in its inner conflict, and the final transference of its loyalty from the cold self-contained ethics of Stoicism to the grace and love of Jesus Christ. No disagreement with Dr. Abbott in details should be allowed to obscure the literary excellence of his work, or the convincing power with which he has brought his readers face to face with the central truth of the Christian Revelation—"our religion is a person—and nothing less." The other volume is the Interlinear Bible, a marvel of typographical skill issued by the Cambridge University Press, with a view to facilitating comparison between the Authorised Version and the Revised. It is not comment or exposition that is given to us, but the actual text of the Scriptures. It reminds us forcibly of the existence at the centre of the critical movement of the Sacred Volume itself; and it recalls us to the Christian duty, too often neglected in our devotion to inferior theological and literary interests, to read and ponder for ourselves.

Such is our record for another year, and some of the impressions which it leaves upon the mind of one reader who is too fond of books not to wish to be fair to them. It cannot be said that it contains much that is either very original or stimulating. We still hug the shore, and are deaf to the voice which bids us launch out into the deep. In one of the brilliant letters which his daughter has just given to the world Lord Lytton speaks of the tendency of the English mind, both in religion and politics, to stick to "the little side of great things." Perhaps there is nothing which our theology needs more than to be emancipated from this too fond attachment to the little side of great things.

W. H. D.

THE LATE PROFESSOR WREDE.

DR. WILLIAM WREDE, Professor of Theology in the University of Breslau, died on November 23, after a long and severe illness, in his forty-seventh year. His death is a sad loss not only to German scholarship, but to New Testament study in general. He stood in the first rank of critics, and had an intellectual and moral power of detaching himself from prejudices and of scientific biblical students. Scholars who felt compelled to contest many of his conclusions could not withhold admiration from his sincerity and his zeal for truth. They profited by the fineness of his critical conscience, and delighted to cross swords with so chivalrous an opponent. His work was free from every mean or personal aim; the truth, whatever the truth might turn out to be, was the one object of his search.

Dr. Wrede's first considerable work was an investigation of the First Epistle of Clement. He has written with insight and force on the attitude of Jesus towards the Messiahship in the Gospel of Mark. It is, however, as a Pauline critic that he is best known, and his "Paulus," in the well-known series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, gives in admirable form, at once clear and condensed, his views on the relation of Paul to Jesus, the Christian community of the first century and the subsequent Christian Church.

The book consists of four chapters, which deal with Paul as a man, with his work, his theology, and his place in Christian history. An account of the early life of Paul, like that of the early life of Shakespeare, means the setting of very few settled facts in due and luminous relation to the conditions of the world in which he lived. This is a task which demands an exact and wide acquaintance with the complicated life and thought of Cilicia and Syria under the early emperors, and a keen imagination, held sternly in hand by a sensitive veracity. Dr. Wrede's purpose is not biographical; it is not the events of Paul's life, but Paul himself, in his intellectual, moral and religious character, that the writer would depict. He has therefore a source which is denied to Shakespeare students, namely, a series of letters by the subject of his inquiry. (Dr. Wrede accepts as genuine 1 Thess. Gal., 1 and 2 Cor., Romans, Col., Philemon and Phil. Unlike Vischer, whose "Paulus-briefe" appears in the same series, he rejects 2 Thess. and Eph.) But these documents all belong to the second period of Paul's life, and are extremely difficult to use without misconception, either through traditional misinterpretation or through defect of sympathy, itself due to lack of knowledge. Dr. Wrede could not allow himself more than 23 octavo pages for his presentation of an intense and intricate personality; and this chapter, in its compression, its clearness, its vivid realisation of remote ways of thought and feeling, is a brilliant piece of work.

The second chapter exhibits the same qualities. The nature of Paul's work, the conditions under which it was done, the degree of its success and its reflex influence on Paul's own character and attitude, the relations of the Gentile church to the community at Jerusalem, the lightning-storm of polemic under which the enormous task was carried through, are brought convincingly before our consciousness. We are enabled to sympathise—as we do in some of Browning's poems—at once or alternately with directly opposite causes and champions, with Paul and his denouncers, with strong brethren and weak, even with "false brethren privily brought in." But in spite of our natural beauty of Jesus, and the uneasiness with which we listen to his bitter and vindictive language, we cannot help being partisans of the great subverter. He wrenched a treasure from the hands of a small and jealous nation to bestow it on mankind; and if in the process it suffered damage at his violent hands, the hurt was not irremediable. After many centuries we are at last beginning to restore it to its old perfection.

The main task to which this little book is addressed is the exposition of Paul's theology, in the 42 pages of chapter III. At the outset our author pens a solemn warning. "The reader who desires to follow us is expressly asked to clear his mind, as completely as he can, of all the conceptions which he may happen to entertain of Pauline doctrine. Among the countless members of Christian churches who believe that they share Paul's views there is to-day not one who could be said really to understand them in the sense in which they were meant. And the same thing is true of those who take up a position more or less hostile to Paul. Those who approximate to a correct apprehension of them are, at most, a few members of certain small communities. And to one who half understands Paul it is much harder to make his doctrine clear than to one who does not know him at all."

This caution is by no means superfluous. Few people are effectively conscious of certain main elements in Paul's view of the world; and even of these only a small minority realise their bearing upon one another, and their total effect on his Christology. And only those who understand the whole doctrine, as a closely articulated system, are able to understand fully any part of it. In order to do this we must adopt beliefs and ways of thinking which are widely remote from those to which we are accustomed. We must hold as a simple, literal matter of fact the existence of a populous angelic and demonic world. The "thrones, dominions, principalities, powers, elements of the world" of Paul's epistles are not, as the wording of our version suggests, poetic coinages or rapturous rhetoric, but real beings, as real as Christ himself, who is their head (Col. ii. 10). Their attitude towards man is, on the whole, hostile, and their influence malign. This conception, though strange, is not difficult; the sympathetic acceptance of Paul's thought regarding death, sin, the flesh and the law is a much harder task. To Paul these are no mere generalisations of phenomena. They are real, active powers having the inevitable force of what we call laws of nature, and the positive malignity of a living will. Paul speaks of them continually as if they were persons, and intends no figure of speech. He is not personifying, for the distinction between personal and impersonal powers in the spiritual world is no part of his thought. In 1 Cor. xv. 24-26 we are told that Christ shall in the end abolish all angelic and demonic lordships; all rule and authority and power, and so deliver up to God an undivided kingdom; and that the last of these enemies to be destroyed will be death. It is easier for us to follow Paul here, and in his similar expressions about the flesh. Sin is, to him, a power which lords over flesh, or works in intimate alliance with it, so that to be in the flesh and not be subject to sin is impossible. We should write these words with capital letters. Sin, Death, Law, operate upon us; we do not bring sin into existence by sinning; the fault we commit is but an effect of the tyranny of sin over us.

Then comes a more difficult conception still, to assimilate which we must throw logic away, namely, the extension of what holds good of the first of a series to every member of that series. Adam was the first man, and Adam's subjection to Flesh, Sin and Death is therefore true of every subsequent man. Christ, becoming flesh, and thereby subjecting himself to Sin, Law and Death, inaugurates a new series of men. At the moment when, by dying, he yields to the utmost which the powers of this world can inflict, he also overcomes them, by passing into a state of existence beyond their sway. Therefore all men who, by belief in Christ, enrol themselves in the new human series, become victors over angels, demons, and all the powers of this world, including Death.

Dr. Wrede enables his readers to master these Pauline conceptions, and to realise the flood of light which they throw upon the whole of his Christology. He passes on, after a fuller examination of Paul's doctrine to the question how Paul reached his conception of Christ. After dismissing the thought that it could have arisen out of an impression of the personality of Jesus, and others which make this pre-existent Christ an invention (or discovery) of Paul's own mind, our author adopts the remaining alternative. Paul believed in such a celestial being, in a divine Christ, before he believed in Jesus. Professor Wrede points to anticipations of Paulinism in Jewish Apocalyptic literature, and does not attempt to carry us further back. But the extraordinary coincidences between Pauline Christology and the mystic teaching of the thiasis had been perceived by many scholars even before the great affinity existing between different mystical cults, and their wide diffusion among the orientated Greeks, and later throughout the Roman Empire, had been evidentially established. It seems now hardly too much to say that Christianity won its way along the lines of this affinity, which is typified in the Liturgy published by Dieterich. The Imperial religion, like the emperors themselves, was established by the army; and its victory over Mithraism, which was in the third century its most formidable rival, may plausibly be ascribed to its association with an undoubtedly historic figure, the gracious figure of Jesus of Nazareth, instead of with a mythical Persian deity. This association, the focusing together of thiasotic mysticism and Messianic Judaism in the person of Jesus Christ, was the work of Paul. How was he led to this world-shaking synthesis? Were Mithraic or similar ideas and feelings already a living leaven, not only in Hellenistic but also in Judæan and even Pharisaic circles, before Pilate washed his hands of innocent blood, and that marvellous week gave birth to the Christian Church? If so, Paul was but the boldest voice and fiercest spirit in an intrinsically Jewish round his mission was but the carrying of Jewish polemic into a world-wide arena. Or was Paul the originator of his own Christology in the sense that its two elements, Pagan and Jewish, were first united in him? The evidence is as yet far from adequate to an answer; but so far as it goes, it seems to show that there is some truth in both suppositions. Paul was not a sudden, unheralded apparition. There had been a work of preparation in Judaism. But he was the first to entertain and proclaim the new, composite gospel in its perfect assimilation, with certainty, enthusiasm and unparalleled devotion in attachment to the faith that Jesus was the Christ. Professor Pfeiderer in his "Entstehung des Christentums" suggests that Paul had been influenced by Mithraic ideas in Antioch. Why not in Tarsus?

The nature of his faith—its absolute conviction, its deep-rootedness in the very essential soul of the apostle—seems to point back to the seed time of boyhood or early youth. Picture him as a young Pharisee, in a family invincibly Jewish and orthodox, but reared in a city where those mystic ideas—by no means incompatible, be it remembered, with his own faith,—were presupposed in all the more earnest talk of the cosmopolitan inhabitants. Picture him gradually and unconsciously shaping amid these influences, his figure of the ideal Christ. Then leap to the moment on the Damascus road, when he reaches the conviction that this ideal is realised, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, the conqueror of death, the redeemer of mankind.

I have strayed a little beyond my theme, but not without warrant. I have but followed up a little way one of the thoughts which this short book, by one whose work on this side is now ended, irresistibly suggests. It is much to be hoped that the translation which already exists in English will shortly see the light. It will, I doubt not, awaken in many hearts a deep regret that the gifted young professor at Breslau was so early called away.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.*

THE volume before us belongs to the series of international commentaries on Holy Scripture, and is to be followed by another which will complete the work. Certainly if unwearied labour continued through a long series of years entitle a man to speak with authority, Dr. Briggs may claim the attentive consideration of scholars for all he says. He has been toiling at the critical interpolation of the Psalter for about forty years, and has constructed a special lexicon of the Psalms which is based on an emended Hebrew text, and which he hopes to publish shortly. It must be confessed that Dr. Briggs does not furnish the student with easy reading. This volume consists of about 400 pages, mostly in small print and crowded with references. The bulk would be greater still were it not for the free use of abbreviations which at first are a little puzzling. The Psalms are considered from every side. The minutest points of grammar are carefully examined: the in full; and the introduction tells us as much as can be known about the way in which the collection was formed, about the ancient versions and the history of the Hebrew text. Some may be inclined to complain that the work reaches inordinate length, and there is no doubt reason for such an opinion. Still, it is well to know that we are acquiring a library of Biblical exegesis as full and accurate as anything which Germany can produce.

Dr. Briggs' position may be described as that of a moderate and learned conservative. One advantage of this attitude is that it enables us to get a clear idea of the critical results which may be fairly considered as established and generally admitted by competent judges. Dr. Briggs sets aside the titles of the psalms as quite worthless, if we are trying to determine questions of date and authorship, though they may be, and sometimes certainly are, of great value as indicating the special collections which coalesced into our present psalter. For example, the title "Of David," or "By David" which occurs at the head of 74 Psalms clearly shows that there was a special hymn-book which, for some reason or other, bore David's name, and this view is confirmed by the words appended to Psalm lxxii., "The prayers of David the Son of Jesse are ended." So we cannot doubt that at one time separate collections existed belonging to the Sons of Korah, or bearing the name of Asaph. There were also booklets in which the word Elohim (God) was substituted for Jehovah, and again there was a little psalter for pilgrims who went up to keep the feasts at the temple on Mount Zion. It is quite another thing to infer that a psalm was actually composed by David because it bears his name in the title. Take, for example, Psalm iii., the very first which bears David's name. Who can believe that such a poem, which makes reference to persecution and desire of vengeance in the most general terms, was really written as the inscription declares, by David fleeing from his son Absalom? Add to this that the titles vary seriously from the Hebrew in the Septuagint, and in the Syriac Peshitta. Further, it may be taken for granted that some psalms are very late and belong, indeed, to the Maccabean period. Dr. Briggs considers some five psalms to be Maccabean, a number which will fail to satisfy many English and foreign scholars, but which at least concedes the principle that the psalter was open to additions as late as the second century B.C. Again, Dr. Briggs admits grievous corruption in the Massoretic text. The fact is proved abundantly by a comparison of the Hebrew text with that of the Septuagint, and still more decidedly by the double and discrepant text which the Hebrew Bible itself furnishes. Thus, 2 Sam. xxii. is repeated with marked variations as Psalm xviii., and we learn the same mistrust of the fidelity with which the text has been transmitted if we set side by side Psalm xiv. with its repetition in an altered form as Psalm liii.; or examine the relation of Psalms lvi. 8-12 to cviii. 1-6; and of ix. 7-14 to cviii. 7-14. Lastly, it is to be observed that the main features of Hebrew metre are now understood. No doubt much remains to be done. Yet we know that a Hebrew line is made up of so many beats or accented syllables, and that the lines are bound together in strophes, so that we have distichs, tetrastichs, &c. It is significant that Dr. Briggs' scansion is not very different from that of Duhm, though they seemed to have worked in complete independence of each other. Nevertheless, it is necessary to remember that many details of Hebrew metre, especially such as are connected with the arrangement in strophes, are still very obscure. Hence it is only with the utmost caution that the supposed laws of Hebrew metre can be used for the emendation of the text.

Most editors, as it seems to us, not excepting Dr. Briggs himself, have gone a great deal too far in forcing the Hebrew text into accordance with their own conjectural theories on metre. The laws of Greek choric metre are much better known than the metres used by Hebrew psalmists and prophets. Yet even in the emendation of Greek choric odes on metrical grounds great caution is needed. "Greek choruses," as Professor Jowett has said ("Republic of Plato," by Jowett and Campbell, vol. ii. p. xxvi.) "have a rhythmical rather than a metrical character. And the transitions from one rhythm to another are so frequent, that there would generally be great uncertainty as to the corruption of a line in which the metre alone appeared to be at fault." Of course, in Greek drama, much help is to be got from the correspondence of strophe and antistrophe. We have very rarely any such help in the study of Hebrew metre.

Dr. Briggs, as we have said, is a conservative critic, though he never allows his conservatism to become unreasonable. He is evidently actuated throughout by a genuine love of truth and respect for the evidence of facts. His chief error, as we venture to consider it, is one which he shares with critics of the radical school. Like them, he tries to decide questions which are, in fact, insoluble. He assigns with considerable confidence psalms to particular dates. He believes, for example, that certain psalms were probably written by David, or at least belong to the period of the early monarchy, and assigns others to the time of the later monarchy and the exile; others to the late Persian, and some few to the Maccabean age. For our own part we can see no adequate means for determining the date of particular psalms, except in a vague and general way. That some psalms are Maccabean we do not doubt; but Duhm does not convince by his bold statements that one psalm belongs to the time of Alexander Jannæus, that another was published as a manifesto of the Sadducee aristocracy, that a third was written in the interests of the Pharisees. The psalms speak of affliction and of victory, but they give us little help if we desire to know the precise circumstances in which the psalmist was placed. Close personal references would obviously unfit a psalm for public use, and if they ever did exist in the original text, later editors and compilers would probably strike them out. So we know of the Jews at this period, and the answer must be, "next to nothing." As for Davidic psalms, Dr. Briggs himself feels, that even the eighteenth psalm, the only one which has any real attestation of its Davidic authorship, contains "late doctrinal conceptions," particularly the assertion of absolute monotheism: He admits that the psalm, as we have it, cannot be earlier than the late Persian or Greek period. He contends, however, that when we have removed two long glosses, v. 21-24 and 25-28, with other minor ones, the rest may be Davidic. Even then he hesitates and suggests that after all the poem may have been written by one who entered by "historic imagination into the experience of the heroic king." Dr. Briggs gives little information on the views held by modern scholars on the date and authorship of the Psalms. Had he done so, his readers would have seen how small is the measure of agreement actually attained. It is difficult to avoid regarding most work of this kind as a waste of ingenuity and labour.

SOME PROSE WRITINGS.*

THE book is happily named. Its title suggests a set of pieces in prose written as aimlessly and as free from constraint as some of Burns's poems were, those to which he referred when he said, "an aim I never fash, I rhyme for fun."² It also suggests, perhaps, that some other of the writer's pieces are or might be in verse. If there is nothing in the volume specially adapted to confirm this latter suggestion, there is also nothing incompatible with it. Indeed one who thinks so freely, and writes so briskly might be the better at times for the discipline of metre. In prose a man may not only utter thoughts that are far from being in tune with the infinite, he may so utter them as not to keep time with the things that are finite. He may be before or behind, above or below, anywhere except in company with his fellows. In verse a man (any man except Walt Whitman) has to keep time with other men. If we do not know the words he means to speak we can see what metre he intends to put them into; and if they stumble or walk lamely in his verse we have excellent patterns before us to show him how he should have made them run. But, however, these writings are prose, and there is hardly a limit that can be set to the freedom of the man who uses this form of communication. He may talk to us reasonably like Emerson, swear at us, and smite us like Carlyle, he may stifle us with overwhelming demonstrations like Macaulay, or leave us wandering where he might have led us if he had kept on like Coleridge. Only one thing is absolutely necessary, by some means or other, by the subjects he treats or by his skill in treating them, by some information that he has to tell or by his odd way of reminding us of what we knew, in some way he must make himself interesting, and never expose us to the temptation of going home before he has finished his sermon. It is only right to say that the necessary condition. Whether he tells us anecdotes of Coleridge or makes relentless but by no means groundless criticisms of Tennyson, whether he talks of the Devil and Dr. Faustus, or whether he head his pages with the words "The Subject Continued," he keeps us awake; he has something to say, and what he says is worth hearing either for itself or at the least for his manner of saying it.

Meantime a little restraint would be good sometimes for the liveliest of men. Criticise Tennyson by all means, and let "C-c-c-oleridge have his joke" as Lamb desired, but it is a sort of rudeness even yet, after all these years, to rattle off the instances of Dr. Johnson's private prayer. Boswell could tell us of them, for Boswell reverenced his hero, and knew the time to laugh and the time to be grave. But the man who runs on, "He prayed when he lost his wife. He prayed when he was of two minds, whether he ought to undertake the Rambler, and whether the Rambler was a good title. He prayed, and in Latin, when he bade farewell to Thrale Place." "He prayed," and so forth, takes an ill advantage of the privilege Boswell has given him, to get a glimpse of a great man in his most solemn moments. "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God," said a sage of the olden days. "Close thine eyes and hold thy tongue when a good man prays," may be added as supplementary advice.

For the rest, no one need fear that he will often be offended by the kind of thing I have here instanced. Except in opinion he will not need to differ much from the author. Generally he will not stop to think how much he differs in opinion. Men and books will be dealt with in such lively terms, that he will hardly resent what is said. Moreover, before he has had time to gasp at some audacious statement he will come across a statement equally unexpected which utters in the most vigorous style a judgment that he has been trying to get a hearing for ever since he was a youngster. When he gets to the end he will first ask if there is another series of these prose writings, for he should be glad at a convenient opportunity to meet with the author again; and then perchance he will turn to the flyleaves at the end of the book, and noting the list of other works by the same author begin to decide which he will try first.

SHORT NOTICES.

Who's Who, 1907.—The annual issue of this indispensable and ever welcome book grows and grows in bulk. Last year the pages numbered 1878; this year there are 1958, in spite of the fact that about 400 of the short biographies drop out, the names passing into the obituary list. There is a great deal of human nature in these records, brief as they must necessarily be, and one may find some amusement also in the appearance of names, for the first time counted of sufficient importance to be included. Doesn't Stephen Phillips know how old he is, or won't he tell? That is seldom this book fails us of such information. (A. & C. Black. 10s. net.)

Who's Who Year-Book, 1907 became a necessity some years ago, because there was no longer room in Who's Who for anything but the biographies. This supplemental volume is full of useful and curious information concerning Government, Parliament, Church, Law, the Press, &c., among this year's new features being the degrees and colour of hoods of various Universities. (A. & C. Black. 1s. net.)

Lotus Land, an account of the Country and the People of Southern Siam, by P. A. Thompson, B.A., A.M.I.C.E., is fruit of the author's three years' residence among the people themselves. It is not a book of adventure, but a picture of the people and their country, where he was engaged in the Royal Survey Department. Such an account of a distant land is always full of fascination, and in this case the impression is greatly strengthened by a large number of photographs, nearly all taken by Mr. Thompson himself. The frontispiece is a coloured picture of the Royal procession barge by a native artist. Scenes on plain and river, Buddhist temples, specimens of native art, the people themselves, especially the children, buffalo and elephant, all may here be studied with profit and pleasure. (J. Werner Laurie, Clifford's Inn. 16s. net.)

In a Nook with a Book, by Frederick W. Macdonald, is a pleasant little volume of essays, by one who through long years of service as a Wesleyan minister (he was appointed secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in 1891, and was president of Conference in 1899) has always been a book-lover. "Books and a Boy," "Early Acquaintance with Macaulay," "Of Certain Boys and their Books," "Ben Jonson's Bible," "A Young Parson and his Reading," are the titles of some of the essays. Burne-Jones married the author's sister, and the last essay is on the short-lived "Oxford and Cambridge Magazine," of 1856. The bits of autobiography are among the pleasantest features of these essays. (Horace Marshall. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Study of Plant Life for Young People, by M. C. Stopes, D.Sc. (Lond.), Ph.D. (Munich), Assistant Lecturer and Demonstrator of Botany at the University of Manchester, is a delightful book, beautifully illustrated. It is simply written, and encourages the young student of plant life to find out things for himself, by experiment and observation to enter into the secrets of growth and the endless charm of beauty in the flowers. Children are, as a rule, more familiar with animals than plants, and the teacher uses this fact with great skill in the earlier sections of the study which unfold the life of a plant. The second part tells of the parts of the plant's body and their uses, and the third is on specialisation in plants; next the five great classes of plants are clearly and simply described, and the last section is on "Plants in their Homes." Technical language is as far as possible avoided. In addition to the full page photographs in illustration, there are a large number of drawings by the author. The book is to be very warmly commended. (A. Moring, Ltd., The De La More Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

Rotherham: The Old Meeting-House and its Ministers, with supplementary chapters. A Narrative by William Blazeby, B.A. (twelfth minister) was published in commemoration of the bi-centenary, celebrated, as we reported at the time, on October 11, 1906. The work is fully illustrated, and was clearly to the author a labour of love. It contains much interesting matter, from early days, going back even to Archbishop Rotherham, whom Edward IV. made Keeper of the Privy Seal and sent as Ambassador to France, but, naturally, concerned chiefly with Nonconformist history. Collectors of our church histories should not miss the opportunity of adding this substantial volume to their shelf. Copies are still to be had at a nominal price of 2s. net (with 4d. for postage) from Mr. G. C. Snaith, 124, Barker Pool, Sheffield.

Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes at Home or in the Sunday School, edited by Charles Roper, B.A., is the third annual volume of this useful publication (the first of Mr. Roper's editing), which is issued in monthly parts for regular use, and fully justifies itself. The lessons for each month are contributed by various writers, including four on Old Testament characters by Dr. Brooke Herford, two by the late Arthur Harvie on the Lord's Prayer, and four on Sowing and Reaping by the late H. Kelsey White. There are also several short articles by the Editor, and commentaries on the year's Bible Readings for each Sunday, as noted on the New Year's Card issued by the Association. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall.)

The Unitarian Pocket Book and Almanac for 1907, compiled by W. Copeland Bowie, with its list of ministers and congregations, and other information, the companion of the diligent and methodical, is got up this year in capital form and festive colour. Easter, we note, is early in 1907, the Sunday falling on March 31. (B. & F. U. A., Essex Hall. 1s. 3d. net.)

Among other books received are the following:—

The Cambridge Modern History.—Vol. IV. The Thirty Years' War. (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)

An Agnostic's Progress, by William Scott Palmer, a good part of which appeared as two articles in the Contemporary Review, which we noted with much interest at the time. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, NEWPORT, I.W.

AMONGST the 2,000 ministers ejected from their livings for conscience sake in 1662, was the Rev. Robert Tutchin, at that time minister of St. Thomas's Church, Newport, Isle of Wight. He was a man who, unremembered though he be for any specific work in his own day, won from his fellow-townsmen no common measure of honour and esteem. He "was so well beloved by the inhabitants of this town," says Calamy, "that when he was turned out, they allowed him the same stipend as when he was their minister, so that they paid two ministers till the day of his death and then interred him in their church." All honour to the good people over whom the turf outside the church walls has been green for two centuries, in that they paid homage with heart and hand to fearless sincerity and Christian grace. Robert Tutchin had three sons, all apparently in holy orders—John, Robert, and Samuel—"all considerable men, and all silenced on the same day" with their father.

Was Robert Tutchin the father of Nonconformity in Newport? We cannot say. We should like to think so, but we do not even know for certain whether he established a congregation after his ejection. A good many years pass before we reach events connected link by link with the "Unitarian Christian Church" of to-day into whose history it is our business to inquire. In the year 1728 a General Baptist chapel was erected in Pyle-street, and it is recorded that near it there was an older Nonconformist meeting and burial ground. Possibly this latter building is the link connecting us with Robert Tutchin and the brave days and leal hearts of 1662. It is surmised that this society was the parent of both the General Baptist and the Presbyterian (now Congregational) churches. It is interesting to note that a funeral sermon still preserved, preached by the Rev. Richard Clarke on the death of Mrs. Sarah Chick, in 1726, gives unmistakable evidence that the fences of orthodoxy were already breaking down. The founders of the General Baptist Chapel in 1728 were feeling their way towards greater freedom.

But they were alive to the fact that liberty sometimes gets people into difficulties. Hence, the insertion in the Trust Deed of a clause directing that if the worship conducted in the building "should have the power to let the Chapel, and distribute the proceeds among poor Christians, but should restore the Chapel to its original use whenever it should be again lawful to worship there." Amongst the signatories to this Trust Deed are the ancestors of several members of the present Unitarian Congregation. We find the Rev. William Mott minister in 1749, his successor two years later being the Rev. John Sturch, who, for the long period of forty-three years, retained the esteem and affection not only of his own flock, but of all sects and parties besides. Evidence of this is shown by pulpit exchanges with the minister of the Independents—an expression of Liberalism worthy of the spirit of Thomas Binney who in later years was minister here. Sturch wrote a history of the Isle of Wight, and it was during his ministry in 1774, that the congregation, waxing bold, came to the front, and built the present chapel in High-street—the old building in Pyle-street being pulled down.

The Rev. Gabriel Watts, at first co-pastor with Mr. Sturch, continued alone for six years, which brings us to the close of the eighteenth century, when he resigned through feeble health.

Thomas Rees, then a student at Carmarthen, captured the hearts of the congregation by his Welsh fire, and would have become their minister but for divergence of views on the subject of baptism. Although far from orthodox the practice of the Church was still avowedly baptist.

The incident left room for Robert Aspland who, early in the following year, was invited to preach as a candidate. He came looking to find a people "equally pious and devotional in temper and conduct and liberal in opinion," and he was not disappointed. He had to travel from London to the island, a journey which a hundred years ago occupied two days. The crossing from Southampton to Cowes—now the matter of an hour—being then effected in a sailing-boat, was largely dependent on wind and tide, and sometimes, as in his case, occupied as much as eight hours. On the third Sunday of his probation, Mr. Aspland received a unanimous invitation to remain as minister, and to his inquiries respecting the limits of freedom of thought tolerated in the pulpit, he promptly received the assurance that "You may go from the highest pitch of Arianism to the lowest pitch of Unitarianism, and give us no uneasiness." My readers may be better informed than I as to the whereabouts of the upper and nether poles of schismatic theology and their specific features—but what man who knows what liberty means could resist the privileges of such double-fisted complacency?

Certainly not the buoyant-spirited candidate in question who was duly installed, and who for his own part announced that, "we are above the superstition and impertinence of forms; in everything we think and act for ourselves." And still we may not incline to be altogether scornful of the fact that there are to this day sundry Powers in the universe which in the matter of form persist in that same superstition and impertinence. We are even disposed to think that such obstinacy nance to forms of all sorts was sweeping and sincere as the following incident at his ordination serves to testify. Previous to the service he had stipulated that there should be no laying-on of hands. Such an observance tended to superstition, and might, by idolatrous touch, desecrate the temples of a champion of individuality with a taint of the abomination of Apostolic succession. An eye-witness completes the pleasant story thus.—"I have a distinct recollection," says he, "of seeing Mr. Mills, when, in the ordination prayer, intercession was made for a blessing on the labours of the young minister, rise from his seat and place his hand on Mr. Aspland's curling locks; and I shall not forget how the colour mounted into his cheek, and by an indignant shake of the head he expressed his dissent from this unexpected addition to the ordination service." Poor, venerable Mr. Mills! He had to defend himself as best he might after it was all over, and his kind old heart could only proffer the plea that he could not help it—while force of habit and acknowledged propriety pushed him from behind, a momentary glimpse of the "curling locks" of the suppliant gave rise to "a sudden and irrepressible desire" to complete the day's work according to ancient usage in spite of breach of contract. The sin, we are glad to hear, though never forgotten, was promptly forgiven.

Robert Aspland is a bright robust figure in Unitarian history, so that another detail or two of his ministry in Newport may be permitted.

As on subsequent occasions, advantage was taken of the presence of a goodly company of friends at the ordination service to bring forward other business of importance. Hence the day is also marked as the birthday of the "Southern Unitarian Society." Second on the list of signatories to the rules adopted at its foundation is the name of the Rev. Thomas Dalton, who, though at the time Vicar of Carisbrooke, was an avowed Unitarian and a friend of both Priestley and Lindsey. Such an anomaly has not, as far as I am aware, occurred since, and the true Christian faith has, through its habit of bifurcation, kept the two communions pretty widely apart.

Mr. Dalton, who was stone-blind, and so, it would seem, unsuspecting of the perils of the way, is still remembered by one aged member of our community, as he used to creep round his parish on his old grey pony. Can it have been the pony that led his all too-trustful master thus unwitting into the briar-patch of heresy?

Mr. Aspland remained a convinced Baptist, and though anything approaching to the obtrusion of his own views on others was repugnant to his liberal spirit, he celebrated baptism in public, and was particular about immersing his subjects forward, which he contended, doubtless on good grounds, was the primitive and proper usage, as well as the least undignified attitude.

A hundred years ago Europe was in the throes of war. The Isle of Wight has ever lured the sea-rover from the days of resistance to the invader, but this could not prevent a landing being made on the coast, and for centuries the French were the terror of the islanders. So that even in 1803, we find the Unitarian minister describing the peril in which the island lay, through fear of invasion, the steps taken for its defence, the flight of the women, the marshalling of the Newport volunteers on Mount Joy, and himself confessing that if it comes to blows, he will find it intolerable, in spite of the exemption of his profession from military service, not to do something. But Mr. Aspland was not called on to fight for his country. He remained, indeed, in the island less than four years, and when he left in 1805, being asked by his congregation to try and find them a successor after his own heart and theirs, he negotiated with that end in view with John Foster, the well-known essayist, who was then an Independent minister at Frome. Such a change of pulpits did not seem unreasonable, as Foster had suffered a temporary aberration into the light from the dark ways of Calvinism. But, had nothing else intervened, the breakdown of his voice and his later return to predestination would have stood in the way of his success at Newport.

Reference to Mr. Aspland's distinguished career at Hackney for the ensuing forty years would carry us beyond our present insular limits.

Venerable minute-books have not failed to preserve, amongst more important matters, some few details of quaint and human quality which we may be pardoned for recalling.

There was no national system of education when, a hundred years ago, some of the good island Unitarians undertook between them to spend four hours a week in the evenings teaching "six poor boys"—the number of scholars was strictly limited—in the elements of the three R's.

The amenities of a well-protected tariff are suggested by such items in the treasurer's accounts as candles for the services at 14s. 4d. a dozen. We should surmise that the temperance movement had not made much headway in those days, or was it that the age of parsimony had not set in, when ministerial supplies were generously allowed 7s. a head for wine to exhilarate the dull intervals between Saturday night and Monday morning? O tempora, O mores! But we are describing the manners and customs of a remote island.

An exquisite touch of domestic consideration on the part of a church secretary occurs in the correspondence relative to the visit of a minister from the North of England, who had consented to fill the pulpit for a few weeks on condition that suitable accommodation could be found for himself, his wife, and his niece. In due course Mr. Secretary replies, that "after many inquiries he has succeeded so far as to meet with neat and comfortable lodgings for twelve shillings a week, for which there are two bedrooms—one a chamber, the other an attic. The former has a four-post bedstead, with painted furniture, the latter a tent bedstead with dimity hangings"; and then for sitting-room a good parlour, looking out upon a street that was both tages not to be lightly passed over, and offering together a unique prospect and very reasonable terms, especially if his correspondent will bear in mind that during those warlike times the town was infested with officers of the army. Needless to say, such inducements proved irresistible.

The experience of the Rev J.—T— has been preserved for the benefit of his successors in the pulpit. Matters were not thriving. There was a cooling of ardour, a falling away of members, a depreciation of funds. Anxious conferences were held. Friend button-holed friend and darkly hinted shortcomings on the part of the esteemed pastor. Finally, at the request of the congregation, a letter to the minister was drawn up by the elders, desiring "that he will in future give his hearers a greater variety in his sermons and prayers, and deliver them with more energy; that he would endeavour to affect the feelings of his auditors as well as to inform their understandings"; "that the minister's language in the pulpit should be more plain and level to the understanding of the lower classes of his hearers." They respectfully advise "that more care should be taken to arrange the papers before the service begins, so as to prevent those unpleasant feelings which are always excited when any embarrassment occurs;" and they conclude with the confident assurance that the gentleman to whom this genial advice is addressed is capable of estimating the value of suggestions calculated to redound to his own as well as to his hearers' benefit.

By way of underlining the penultimate clause, it is mentioned parenthetically that, under pressure of circumstances much to be lamented, the minister's salary has to be reduced from £90 to £75. Thus to a virtuous yet unperfected preacher came honey of sweet counsel mixed with vinegar.

During the next twenty years after Mr. Aspland left, the Newport pulpit was occupied by a succession of good men whose works have followed them—Revs. John Tingcombe, Benjamin Goodier, William Stevens, and William Hughes, father of the present Mr. William Hughes, who lived on his farm at Youngwoods, but frequently occupied the pulpit. He was the first of a series of at least half a dozen ministers who have come to Newport from the North of Ireland.

In 1823 came the Rev. Edmund Kell, M.A., still gratefully remembered, in whose days the chapel was enlarged, and Sunday-schools added for the needs of the hundred scholars. About this time an endowment of £30 a year became available, and there was a chapel library containing, it is recorded, a thousand volumes. If this number is correct, a large proportion of these books must at present be in circulation.

Edmund Kell, like Robert Aspland, made history. His name is associated with incidents too good to be forgotten—as, for instance, the following:—

The Rev. Samuel Wilberforce, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, was then Rector of Briststone, I.W., and the good friend of the Unitarian minister at Newport. As is well known, up to his last fatal ride, Mr. Wilberforce was a very fond of hunting. To such, the island foxes, which are many and gamesome, offer irresistible attractions. So it came about, as history alleges, that the sportive rector, having been absorbed with the duties of the chase throughout the week, would find himself jogging homeward late on a Saturday afternoon. The house of his friend, the Rev. Edmund Kell, lies on the road—for all roads go through Newport. He stops, and some such conversation as the following takes place: "I've been out all the week, Kell, and had no time to prepare anything for to-morrow; what are you preaching about?" The text is supplied. "And what are your heads?" These are duly tabulated. "Thank you," says Mr. Wilberforce. "Now you can go your way and I'll go mine. Good-night!"

The story of how Mr. Kell founded the Church of the Saviour at Southampton, which is equally characteristic, belongs to the ecclesiastical history of that town, from which I am under severe temptation to steal it, but space, if not honour, forbids. Suffice it to say, that Mr. Kell's able ministry in Newport extended over thirty years, and when in 1853 it came to an end, Southampton was only too happy to welcome him to a fresh field of labour. As one who meant to go up with might against that ancient port, he set up his banner in The Ditches—the site of the original moat—subsequently removing to the fine church in High-street, in the heart of the city.

Mr. Kell's activities in Newport extended over a wide field. He was the founder of the local museum, and a keen student of archaeology, being a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

Half a century or so since, the Unitarian congregation was a force of considerable moment in the life of the island. At the incorporation of the borough of Newport in 1835, out of eighteen new town councillors no less than six were members of the High-street Church.

In 1875, the centenary of the present building was celebrated by the carrying out of somewhat extensive alterations. The chapel was re-seated and a new pulpit erected. The baptistery was then finally closed. In 1881 the excellent new school-room was built, and in 1894 the organ was placed in the chapel. The subsequent history of the congregation is a matter of yesterday and to-day, and is fresh in the minds of its present members and of many others. We need only to recall the names of John Dendy, William Jesse Jupp, and Clement Pike among its most recent ministers, and of Thomas Cooke, Thomas Chatfield Clarke, and Robert Pinnock, who was five times Mayor of the town, among its laymen, to awaken a host of happy memories in the minds of those who have known and honoured them.

MOTHER BICKERDYKE AS I KNEW HER.

BY MRS. FLORENCE S. KELLOG, OF FAY, KANSAS.

(From the Chicago "Unity.")

IT HAD ALWAYS BEEN my aim to get as much pure milk and as many fresh eggs as she wanted for hospital use, and as time passed, and the fortunes of war left fields untilled, dairies and poultry yards more and more uncared for, this difficulty increased, until, in desperation, Mrs. Bickerdyke determined to apply once again to the generous people of the North for help. Her plan for bringing a drove of cows and hens to camp was at first only laughed at, but this added to her determination, and finally permission was given her to "try it." She secured a twenty days' "furlough," and ere its expiration had made a trip up through Illinois and returned with one hundred fine milch cows "warranted not to give chalk-and-water milk," and a thousand hens, each pledged to lay her "one egg a day for hospital use." They were cared for on an island near Memphis by the "contrabands." As the months passed and there was no lack of pure milk and fresh eggs, many were they who blessed Mrs. Bickerdyke for her foresight and the wisdom of her plan. When finally the hospitals were broken up because they were no longer needed, these herds and flocks were given to faithful "contrabands" who had cared for them.

* Previous parts of this record appeared Sept. 15 and 29, and Oct. 6.

From Memphis Mrs. Bickerdyke went to Vicksburg, where there was greater need of her services, working there and at Jackson through the long hot summer days, until, early in the fall, General Sherman sent her North for rest and recuperation, but only for a short time, for when he with his troop reached Chattanooga, she joined them there. She had a great admiration for several of our great generals, but most of all for Sherman. She loved him, and, after the fall of Vicksburg, she considered herself as part of his force and under his command, though he used laughingly to say she "outranked" him.

She was put in charge of the field hospital at Mission Ridge near Chattanooga, after that dreadful battle "above the clouds," in November, 1863, and, for over a month was the only woman there. It is almost impossible to imagine the scene there where the wounded and the exhausted assigned to her care numbered over two thousand. What a fearful tax upon her strength and her sympathies! When I think of her here, recalling the mangled bodies, the faces distorted with pain, torn with shot and shell, the long, long lines of them dead, wounded and dying, I think of that passage in "Rab and His Friends," where, in telling of the young medical students who came in eager haste to watch the operation performed for poor little "Ailie's" relief, it says of them: "In them pity, as an emotion, ending in itself or at best in tears and a long drawn breath, lessens, while pity as a motive is quickened, and gains power and purpose." This must have been her experience. She had no time for tears nor for weak shrinking from the sight of suffering, so natural and common to woman. She must needs put all her energies into work, her eyes must be clear, her hands steady to assist in the operation, and would give relief in days to come. She must go here, there, and everywhere, helping, cheering, and encouraging. One woman among over two thousand sufferers! One of weaker nature and of less sure control of self must have been appalled by the magnitude of the task, but not Mother Bickerdyke. Her strength rose to meet the need and she was a very host in the work she did.

But it told heavily upon her—the terrible scenes at Mission Ridge, the incessant work that lasted all through the rest of November, through December, and into January, when she broke down so utterly that she was obliged to go home to rest and regain her strength. She used to say with a shudder, as if again it was all before her: "I can never get those awful scenes out of my mind and sight. Sleeping or waking they are with me. I see the mangled bodies, shot and torn in every possible way, I hear the cries and groans. Oh, it is horrible! horrible!" Ah, yes, indeed it was "horrible," but her resolution bore her through whatever she undertook, and she could endure any sight so only that she might help to alleviate the suffering and make the condition more bearable. Her pity, her sympathy was expressed in action. There were no "tears, idle tears," for her.

Though she was so worn out with all she had endured, she recuperated quickly, and in March we find her again with Sherman and his army going on from Chattanooga to Huntsville, from Huntsville to Nashville, and then on over that terrible road to Resaca. Over steep mountains, through narrow passes, and across streams and rivers she followed fearlessly—doing everywhere her good work—carrying cheer and comfort—wherever she went. Sometimes she would make a sudden "raid," as she called it, on the northern people for the vegetables and sanitary supplies always so much needed, but these "raids" gave her no rest, but were all a part of the work she had set herself to do. I laughed to hear her tell of her bread baking along the line of march, and must almost agree with the negroes that there was "magic in her hands," or how else did she make good, sweet bread under such adverse circumstances. No wonder the soldiers said "Mother Bickerdyke could make bread on a mule's back"—or anywhere else. What memories of home those loaves of bread must have awakened in the soldier's breast, and how good they must have tasted after living on "hard tack" and like army "delicacies" (!).

From Resaca, after her work was done there, the line of march followed to Kingston, to Altoona, and on to Atlanta. She followed her leader through those long, hot summer days untiringly—merciless only to herself. Another brave, devoted woman went with her—Mrs. Eliza Porter—who long before had been named as "the Angel of the Hospitals." The two women were very unlike in person and in methods of working, but both were alike devoted to the soldiers, and eager to alleviate, as far as possible, the horrors of war, and they comforted and cheered each other through General McPherson fell, and Mother Bickerdyke must needs close his eyes for that last long sleep and send what comfort she could to his dear ones at home. She used to say laughingly that she "treated an officer just as well as a private—if he behaved as well." Shoulder straps, stars, and bars meant little to her unless they represented true worth and gallant service. All this she found in General McPherson—he whom Sherman loved, and of whom he spoke so highly—and we can think how her hands lingered over his cold face, and how, even as a mother might, she did what she could for him who no longer needed earthly services.

Mrs. Livermore tells us how, while Sherman and his brave troops marched on from "Atlanta to the Sea," Mrs. Bicker-dyke again went North, as before busying herself with the gathering up of supplies, as "Sherman had directed her to meet him when he reached the Atlantic coast and to bring to his troops all the supplies that could be gathered, and gave her orders for transportation, on his account, to any desired extent." So perfect was his confidence in her, so sure was he that no privilege would be abused by her. As she was irresistible when in hospital wards, so, too, was she irresistible when she stood before an audience pleading the needs of the soldier boys who, far from home and its comforts, were battling bravely for the Union, enduring hardships and privations such as we can scarcely imagine now, that there might be "one country and one flag" for us all. The responses to her calls were ever quick and generous, and so it was that when at Philadelphia in December, 1864, word came to her that Sherman had reached the sea at Savannah, she was ready with a great boatload of provisions and other necessities to start southward once more. How her heart must have rejoiced when she knew later that "Christmas gift" of the city of Savannah, with one hundred and fifty heavy guns and plenty of ammunition, and also about twenty-five thousand bales of cotton Sherman presented to President Lincoln! How thousands of hearts, both North and South, rejoiced and gave thanks to the "God of Battles" for this victory that we all knew meant so much towards the ending of the war! As Lincoln said in his reply to the despatch from General Sherman announcing the presentation of this great gift, it brought "those who sat in darkness to see a great light"—the light of Peace—coming.

"Not like a mourner bowed

For honour lost and dear ones wasted,

But proud to meet a people proud,

With eyes that tell of triumph tasted."

But there was yet much to do ere this day really came, and in it all Mother Bickerdyke had her faithful share. It was while delayed at Wilmington, N.C., upon this trip to Savannah that she cared for the Andersonville prisoners, who had been brought there, and in doing this contracted the blood poisoning from which her hands never fully recovered, and that made it necessary for her to have much of her after writing done by others. But why attempt to follow her in detail farther? In all this writing, I have not given you such understanding of her character as will make you know how surely she would pursue her chosen work until all was done that could be done by woman's hands and the army was disbanded, the soldiers gone to their homes to rest and, in time, to enter upon the gentler arts of peace, then indeed have I failed of my purpose—and written in vain. But it was long after the cannons had ceased to roar and the guns were "stacked" before Mother Bickerdyke was mustered out, as she was finally, with the last of the Illinois troops at Camp Butler, Springfield, Ill., in March, 1866. Up to that time she had found plenty to do in different hospitals, where sick and wounded soldiers yet lingered, and she did it all faithfully to the last.

LETTERS FROM SOUTH AFRICA:

I.

It is as prophetic as it is strange that between the earliest known occupants of ancient Britain and of ancient Rhodesia a commercial relation may be traced. Strong presumptive evidence exists that the massive gold collars, shaped like the crescent moon, that were worn by the Brythonic kings of the isles of Western Europe, were wrought from gold extracted from the quartz reefs of Mashoraland.

Here exists another instance of history repeating itself. As long ago as 1100 B.C., the very region that has attracted British attention within recent years was occupied by gold diggers; and some of that gold adorned the brow of beauty of prehistoric Enids and Guineveres.

Between the Zambesi and the Limpopo rivers, over an area some 250 miles in length, this ancient gold-seeking people have left behind 500 ruins of former buildings, which an excavator describes as the "most mysterious and complex structures it has ever been my fate to look upon." They have left behind their carvings in stone, their religious symbols and gold-smelting crucibles, with traces of gold workings still adhering to them. By means of these relics deduction is reached that the ancient occupiers were Phœnicians, or a race who provided gold for the merchants of Phœnicia and Arabia.

The ruins tell of a people highly civilised, who had made great advances in the art of building and decorating, and applied to their buildings measurements based on the ratio of the diameter to the circumference of a circle, and similar mathematical principles. The solid towers and monoliths, that are usually explained as emblems of phallic worship, resemble others found in various places along the Mediterranean. The elliptical form of a huge wall that stands at the Great Zimbabwe is of the same form as that of the temple found at Marib, the capital of the Sabeian kingdom in Arabia. And as a romantic detail in the evidence it was discovered that an ingot of tin found in Falmouth harbour, in Cornwall, fitted into the peculiar knuckle-bone ingot mould found at Zimbabwe, confirming a statement of Diodorus as to the shape of the British smelting vessels. It has long been known that the Phœnicians came to Cornwall for tin, and left their traces in place names and in Eastern to be preserved and valued. But that they brought into Britain not only the dyes of Tyre, and the saffron of Syria, and the spices of Araby, but also the gold of Ophir (otherwise Mashoraland), is a new and staggering piece of evidence.

One hopes that this glimpse into ancient history will enable the Britisher who is pained by modern methods of gold seeking, to trace some purpose of destiny in our dealings with South Africa. Those ancient diggers made no attempt to colonise the land they pilfered of its mineral treasure. They occupied the land like a garrison in the midst of an enemy's country, as their labyrinthic fastnesses indicating strong strategic ingenuity show. The carved hawks they placed as emblems of the deities that presided over the mines suggest rapacity and plunder. Up to the present day that carved hawk has been the curse of South Africa. There is no hope for the country until the mineral wealth extracted from it shall cease to flow into the casinos, green-rooms and racecourses of Europe, and be devoted to developing the resources of the land. The cost of living is three or four times that in England, because nearly everything has to be imported. But in order that the country may raise its own food, works of irrigation and a network of railway lines will be necessary. For this project tremendous capital is required: But the land itself has already provided means for its own redemption. Nature has paid the wages beforehand. The gold mines and diamond reefs have sufficient wealth to turn the deserts of South Africa into a rose garden. The future of the country depends upon the application of South African wealth not to the enrichment of the alien adventurer, but to the enhancing of the welfare of the united South African race.

II.

The Africander prejudice against colour, so far as the native is concerned, has a little philosophical justification. Generally speaking, the various members of the Bantu race (Zulus, Basutos, Pondos, Matabeles, &c.), popularly designated Kaffirs, are in most respects inferior to the intelligent colonist, though every city in Europe has its section of savage population. But instead of being a submerged tenth the native outnumbers the white in the proportion of four to one. There is therefore a very serious native problem, a problem which, according to Lord Selborne, in a recent utterance, is the "most difficult and complex that the human mind had to face." He referred to the peculiar difficulties arising from the existence of two different stages of civilisation—that of Europeans, with an experience of 2,000 years behind them; and that of the savage, who is still a child, and who looks upon life from a totally different point of view. How can two races, so widely apart in evolution, be brought under one civilisation, one law, one social code? No law would be just which rode roughshod over this undeniable fact of wide diversity of character, of tradition, of custom, and the separated grades of evolution. The native fulfils the child's standard. He respects power, but he has a deeply ingrained sense of justice. In his superiors he expects the just exertion in his almost religious faith in the far-off White King beyond seas, who has promised to do right by him. He endures much wrong while the hope lasts that the "great White King" will redress it. But some times unjust power incites him to deeds of bloodthirsty revenge which now and again shock Europe. The penal measures then resorted to by his masters, chiefly inspired by fear of the natives' superior numbers, become more shocking still. In the long run he always has to submit to being "eaten up."

It is often said that the Kaffir is naturally lazy. Sir Harry Johnston denies it. So does Mr. Dudley Kidd, the author of "The Essential Kaffir." Mr. Theodore Bent refers to one of his retinue as the most industrious man he ever met. The fact is that the Bantu will work with heart and will in what appears to him good work, such as cultivating his chief's garden or conducting a tribal hunt, or carrying heavy packages on the head long distances for a benevolent employer. In a dozen books I have read upon the subject are innumerable instances of the ready way in which savages will respond with resolute loyalty to those who treat them kindly and justly.

What differs is his notion of the good of life. Having done sufficient to bring a modicum of food and shelter, he deems it good to bask in the beloved sun-rays, and admire the ripening grain, and watch his cattle, and recite tales of derring-do. He loves all animal pleasures too, and they fill somewhat too large a place in his mind. But, after all, it is a savage mind. When, however, a hailstorm suddenly destroys his crops he does not whine, but cheerfully accepts the new necessity, and takes to the long path that leads to the mines, where his companions often die of pneumonia or contract consumption. Such work belongs, however, only to the period of want. When circumstances brighten he will return to the free and open-air life, which he loves better than the wage-earner's existence in the compounds. That open-air life seems to him the only real life. And many moderns, weary of the sicknesses of civilisation, are inclined to agree that he has chosen the better part.

Like other children, he is not a utilitarian. He is a materialist, whose materialism is glorified by the natural romantic and idealising power of childhood. He lives in an atmosphere of poetry. He is always on the stage. He is always posing and playing at make-believe. He performs every function with histrionic éclat. Eloquence, dramatic action are second nature to him. When he adopts European civilisation he takes it with a child's happiness in a new toy. To travel on the railways in South Africa is to be ever repeating the experience of taking our Sunday-school children at home to the seaside. Only the children are grown up here. They sing the music-hall songs learnt through the gramophone in the dealer's cabin. The windows are crowded with dusky faces. They accost their fellows at every station with mirthful badinage, and every platform is ringing with laughter and good humour. They contrast favourably with the sour-visaged European you may very seldom chance to see, who is soured by disappointment or hardened by greed. children of the sunshine into sullen factory hands and half-blind, meagre-faced office clerks! Yet the creation of new wants and the extension of European methods of education is leading numbers of their race into the South African counterparts of these trades and professions of our industrial system.

III.

To remove into a new world does not of itself suffice to generate a new world of thought and feeling. But a new generation born in the new country, and exclusively bred under new conditions, acquires a new mind and a new spirit. For them their forefathers' emigration becomes a way of salvation. I will try to analyse this new spirit as I see it witnessed in South Africa.

The first element that attracts the attention of the student of human nature is a certain robustness and sanity in the character of the born Colonial. Life is almost entirely lived in the open air. The veld has a rare power of knocking the nonsense out of a man. A youth who has been "roughing it" in battle with the elements can never so effectively play the fool in elegant drawing-rooms. The typical Colonial is lithe, alert, spare as an Arab race-horse, a man of action rather than a man of words, capable of silence and endurance, possessing the natural grace that comes from intimacy with wide and open-faced Nature, affable, with complete absence of airs, free from condescension or patronage, knowing no haughty disdain, and fearing not "the blank amaze of their haughty gaze" of any of the bluest-blooded aristocrats in the world. There is no moon-shine about him, and no fear of tradition or convention or the tyranny of great names. He has an air of frankness, of sincerity, of salubrious good humour.

From this sane and virile quality flows his optimism. Under these brilliant skies it requires some effort to be depressed and morose, and dwell in the thought of natural depravity of human nature and to call existence a vale of tears. The very climate is killing out Calvinism. Meteorological conditions render the old theology effete and useless. The Colonial believes in himself, in his gifts of grace and gifts of nature, in his future, in his people, in his country. Mutual hero worship is a prominent feature of social gatherings and of press notices. The very fact that you co-exist with me in a certain territory raise your value in my eyes. There is a spirit of cordial fellowship, of good comradeship, of radiant confidence in each other that is almost infectious.

This worth may be derived from the fewness of the European population. Imagine the people of London spread over the whole of Europe, and you have some idea of the sparseness of white population in the whole sub-continent. The population of the Cape is less than that of Birmingham. So a greater importance attaches to every individual than in England. Your landing is published. Your doings reported. Your sayings chronicled. You begin to feel that you possess a greatness, recognition of which has been sadly neglected at home. Here people are far-seeing and appreciate genius. But it is the isolation and paucity of the white

A very important element in the formation of the Colonial spirit is the life in a land that appeals to the imagination. The long distances; the vast deserts; the silence and solitude of the veld; the indescribable sunsets; the presence of wild animals, encounter with whom means adventure and novelty and peril; contact with so diverse races and different civilisations—all this appeals to the fancy and stirs the imagination. No wonder the Colonial finds England dull and cramped, and calls it "Noah's ark," for the greatness of an old country is not to be found of the eye alone. That greatness must be sought for in its libraries, its art galleries. And here we place our finger on the deficiencies of Colonial culture. There is very little literary or artistic taste, very little love of art and poetry. There is a defect in sentiment, in reverence, in susceptibility to the tender and gracious things that are as a bloom on the peach of civilisation; there is a certain hardness and bluntness of sensibility to the ideal virtues that survive amid the ancient civilisations in spite of their anachronism.

In the South African press the state of the money market is the first item in the epitome of news; in Britain it is the last. Perhaps in both lands utilitarian considerations are held to be uppermost, but we still retain in Britain an old-world shame which makes a difference at least in the emphasis of our confession.

South Africa is the home of realism. It is not a place to tell dreams. You have to show the practical value of your ideas; and if the new theology or the new psychology, or the new diet, or what not, cannot vindicate itself on practical grounds, it stands little chance of winning a hearing. Herein lies the hope of acceptance and the fear of rejection of our rational message. That 50 per cent. of the European population attend the Dutch Reformed Church, and that it possesses so much property and enjoy so many emoluments, constitute two reasons in its favour; but that the D.R.C., with all its power and its prophecy of our early untimely end, failed to crush us out of existence, and our members have such a strange prejudice for paying their debts, are two arguments in favour of the Liberal Church of South Africa, still weak and little, but destined to become a thousand.

Cape Town. J. TYSSUL DAVIS

THE Indian National Congress was opened at Calcutta on Wednesday with the presidential address of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji. It was a powerful plea for self-government, and for union and strenuous agitation to that end on the part of the people of India. Mr. Naoroji pleaded for a national system of free compulsory education, and said: "The peasants of Russia are fit for and obtained the Duma from the greatest autocrat in the world, and the leading statesman, the Prime Minister of the free British Empire, proclaimed to the world, 'The Duma is dead; long live the Duma!'" Surely the fellow-citizens of that statesman and the free citizens of that Empire by birthright and pledged rights are far more entitled to self-government, a constitutional representative system, than the peasants of Russia. I do not despair. It is futile to not so wait for their Parliament. We are not allowed to be fit for 150 years. We can never be fit till we actually undertake the work and the responsibility. While China in the East and Persia in the West of Asia are awakening, and Japan has already awakened, and Russia is struggling for emancipation—and all of them despotisms—can the free citizens of the British Indian Empire continue to remain subject to despotism—the people who were among the first civilisers of the world? The modern world owes no little gratitude to these early civilisers of the human race. Are the descendants of the earliest civilisers to remain in the present times of spreading emancipation, under the barbarous system of despotism, unworthy of British instincts, principles, and civilisation?"

OBITUARY.

EDWIN CLEPHAN, J.P.

ANOTHER of our stalwarts has gone to his rest, and we shall sadly miss the bright and vigorous presence of Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, who passed away on Sunday morning, at his residence in Regent-road, Southfields, in his ninetyeth year. Leicester has lost one of its finest citizens, the Great Meeting a most loyal member, and our whole community a leader of generous enthusiasm and the greatest kindness of nature.

Mr. Clephan was of Scotch descent, but was born at Stockton-on-Tees, May 29, 1817. He went as a young man to Leicester, where his eldest brother, Mr. James Clephan, was on the editorial staff of the Leicester Chronicle. After some years with a jeweller and silversmith, Edwin Clephan entered the Bank of Messrs. Paget & Kirby, and became in time confidential manager and friend of Mr. T. Tertius Paget, and subsequently partner in the firm of Paget, Paget & Clephan. After fifty-six years' work Mr. Clephan retired from business, but by no means from active service of the public. Education, philanthropy and politics alike claimed his strenuous service, and he was among the most generous of men. Himself of trained artistic tastes, he did much for the Art School and was President of the Leicester Society of Artists; he was no less devoted to music, and was on the Council of the Literary and Philosophical Society. A borough and a county magistrate, he was assiduous in his duties and honoured for his sound judgment and high integrity of character. He was a trustee of the general charities of the borough, a Governor of the Infirmary, and in many other ways devoted to the public good. He was twice Master of the John o' Gaunt Lodge of Freemasons. He was a keen politician and a leader of the Liberals in his borough and county. For many years he served on the committee of the National Liberal Federation.

At the Great Meeting Mr. Clephan had been for twenty-five years chairman of the vestry, and he was for many years on the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In 1884-5 he active member of the committee of the Association, keenly interested especially in the missionary work for the support of our churches.

Mr. Clephan retained almost to the end the vigour and fire of his youth, and certainly was "always young for liberty." His presence in a meeting always told; he could always be counted on for generous judgment and generous help. We must not mourn that after close upon ninety years of such a useful life, he is granted his discharge, but let his memory remain with us, an inspiration in all true and honourable work.

With Mr. Clephan's daughters, Mrs. A. H. Paget, Mrs. G. S. Elgood, and Miss Clephan, the deepest sympathy will be felt, a sympathy with much more than sorrow in it, with the memory of such a life. The funeral service, after cremation, was at the Great Meeting on Friday afternoon.

BASIL MARTINEAU.

A WORD of remembrance we must dedicate also to Mr. Basil Martineau, Dr. Martineau's youngest son, who passed away, as we announced last week, at his residence, 3, Eldon-road, Hampstead, on Wednesday, December 19, at the age of 67. He had been ill only for a few days, of influenza first, on which the fatal pneumonia supervened. Born in Liverpool, September, 1839, Basil was the youngest of the family, with the exception of Miss Edith Martineau, and as a small boy shared in the wonderful year of his father's residence abroad, 1848-9, while Hope-street Church was being built. On the removal of the family to London, he was for some years in a shipping office, and then was articled to Mr. Philip Henry Lawrence, and became a solicitor. He was passionately fond of music, which he had studied under Mr. Hermann in Liverpool, and was for many years organist at Little Portland-street Chapel. With his brother Russell, and the late Rev. J. T. Whitehead, he joined in preparing the musical edition of Dr. Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," published in 1876. He married Clara, daughter of Mr. William Fell, of Ambleside, who survives him. His life, entirely unassuming, of deep and true affection, was brought to a peaceful close. The funeral service, last Saturday morning in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, was enriched by the music that he loved, and was conducted both there and at the Hampstead Cemetery by the Rev. Henry Gow.

WORSHIP.

I saw a throne, but not of gold,
No king sat thereupon;
No sinners worshipped, bent and old,
A sun that never shone.

The throne was Earth, the people Here,
Intent to know the Truth,
Who, as they loved her, lost their fear
And found the heart of youth.

They looked on heaven pure and calm,
They bore their sorrow's load,
They sang a mighty ancient psalm
Dec. 18, 1906. ROLLO RUSSELL.

MAY we once more renew our appeal for special subscriptions, in order to send copies of THE INQUIRER to Free Libraries throughout the country? We have for years had reason to be grateful to friends who have generously aided in this work, but with further help it might be largely extended. The late Mr. Bristow used to subscribe for six copies to be sent to as many theological colleges. That is a subscription which we should gladly see taken up again.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—Alan F. Coventry, of Willaston School, Nantwich, eldest son of Mr. Ernest Coventry, has gained an exhibition in Natural Science (Biology) at Magdalen College, Oxford.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.

—The annual Christmas treats to the old people and children of the Sunday-school were held on Dec. 14 and 15. On the first evening the children had their tea and magic lantern entertainment, each child being given a garment provided by the Mary Carpenter Guild. An interesting feature was the Scripture recitations by the children to compete for Bibles kindly presented by the treasurer of Oakfield-road Church. On the following evening the old people and inmates of Stokes Croft Almshouse and elder scholars had their tea, after which there was a public meeting and entertainment, when Mr. P. J. Worsley, president of the Mission, took the chair, and there were present the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and Edgar I. Fripp, treasurer and secretary of the Mission, and friends from Bristol and Clifton congregations. Mrs. Hartland distributed the prizes to the elder scholars. A very kind letter was read from the missionary, Mrs. Broadrick, expressing her keen regret at not being able to be present at either meeting on account of recent indisposition, her warm interest in the work, and her sincere hope that she would soon be about amongst them again.

Cardiff (Resignation).—The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., having accepted an invitation to Hull has resigned the pulpit of the West Grove Church.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street—Following on the special services and meetings which marked the jubilee celebrations, a sale of work was opened on Friday, Dec. 14, by Dr. John Barlow, chairman of the church committee, and on Saturday, 15th, by Mrs. Ballantyne, President of the Ladies' Social Sewing Society. The results were entirely gratifying both to the ladies who took part and the congregation as a whole. The amount realised was about £150.

Hull (Appointment).—The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., of Cardiff, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the Park-street Church, in succession to the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, and expects to enter upon his new charge on the first Sunday in February.
